DIVINITY, s. [divinitas, Lat.] a partaking of the nature and excellence of God; godhead; deity. Figuratively, God, the Supreme Being, the Creator and Preserver of all things; a false deity or idol. The science conversant about God, heavenly things, and the duties we more immediately owe to him; theology; something supernatural.

DIVISIBILITY, s. [divisibilité, Fr.] the quality of admitting division, either mentally or actually; discernibility.

DIVISIBLE, a. [divisibilis, Lat.] capable of being actually or mentally divided into parts; discernible.

DIVISIBleness, s. the quality of being divided.

DIVISION, s. [divisio, Lat.] the act of dividing any thing into parts; the state of being separated; disunion; discord; distinction. In Arithmetic, one of the four fundamental rules, whereby we find how often a less number, called the divisor, is contained in a greater, called the dividend; the number of times which the divisor is contained in the dividend being termed the quotient. In Natural Philosophy, or Mechanics, the taking a thing to pieces in order to have a more complete conception of the whole. This is frequently necessary in very complex beings, or a piece of curious mechanism, the several parts of which cannot be surveyed at one view. In Music, the dividing the interval of an octave into a number of less intervals. In Rhetoric, the arrangement of a discourse into several heads. In War, the divisions of a battalion are the several parts into which it is divided in marching. At Sea, the third part of a fleet of men of war, and sometimes the ninth, which last happens when the fleet is divided into three squadrons, for then each squadron is distributed into three divisions. In an engagement, the order of battle is to place all the squadrons and all the divisions on each side in one line; and this order is kept as long as the wind and other circumstances will permit.

DIVISOR, s. [divisor, Lat.] in Arithmetic, the dividing number, or that by which the dividend is divided, and which shews how many parts it is to be divided into.

DIVORCE, s. [divortium, Lat.] a breach or dissolution of the bond of marriage, or the legal separation of man and wife. The usual divorces among us are of two kinds, viz. a mensâ & thoro, from bed and board; and, a vinculo matrimonii, from the bond or tie of marriage. The first does not dissolve the marriage, since the cause thereof is subsequent to it; and at the same time supposes the marriage to be lawful. This divorce may be on account of adultery in either of the parties, for the cruelty of the husband, &c. As this divorce dissolves not the marriage, so it does not debar the woman of her dower, nor bastardize her issue, or make void any estate for the life of the husband and wife. A divorce a vinculo matrimonii, entirely dissolves the marriage, as the cause is a pre-contract with some other persons, consanguinity or affinity within the Levitical degrees, impotency, impuberty, &c. In this case, the dower is gone, and the children begotten between the parties divorced are bastards. On this divorce the parties are at liberty to marry again; and in divorces for adultery, several acts of parliament have allowed the innocent party marriage with another person. Divorces are only to be had by consent of parliament.

To DIVORCE, v. a. to separate husband and wife from each other; to abolish and annul the marriage contract. Figuratively, to force asunder, or to separate by violence; to take away by force; to put away.

DNIEPER, anciently Boristhenes, a large river of Europe, rising in the government of Tver, or Tweer, and falling into the Black Sea about 10 miles below Ockzakow. It flows entirely through the Russian dominions through its whole course of about 800 miles; during which its navigation is only once interrupted by a series of cataracts, which begin below the mouth of the Samara, and continue for 40 miles. They are passed, however, without much hazard, even by loaded barks, except in seasons of great drought.

DNIESTER, anciently Tyras, a fine river of Europe, which rises in Galicia, or Austrian Poland, and passing by Choczim, Bender, &c. falls into the Black Sea at Akerman, between the mouths of the Danube and Dnieper.

To DO, v. a. [preter. did, part. pass. done; don, Sax.] to perform, act, or practise. To execute or discharge, applied to a message; to cause; to transact; to have recourse to, used as a sudden and passionate question. To perform; to exert; to deal; to gain a point; to put; to finish; to conclude; to settle. What to do with, signifies to bestow, to employ, to dispose of, or what use to make of. "He knows not what to do with his money." Neuterly, to cease to be concerned with. "I have done with him." To fare; to be conditioned with respect to health or sickness. To be able to succeed, or perfect a design. "We shall do without him." Addison. Sometimes however it is used to save the repetition of another verb. "I shall come, but if I do not, go away;" i. e. if I come not. Sometimes it is used as a word of peremptory and positive command; as, "Help me, do." Or to increase the emphasis of the verb which follows it; "But I do love her." Shak. And sometimes by way of opposition; "I did love him, but scorn him now."

DO'CIBLE, a. [docilis, Lat.] submitting to instruction; easy to be taught; tractable; docile.

DOMINGO, St. or Hispaniola, or Hayti, i. e. High Land, the richest of the Caribbee Islands in the West Indies, 370 miles in length, and from 60 to 120 in breadth; divided at the W. end into two peninsulas, about 25 miles broad, that to the S. being the longest, and extending 150 miles. The climate, though hot, is healthy, except to new comers. The country is uncommonly fruitful, and beautifully diversified with hills and valleys, woods and rivers; it is also well stocked with fruit trees, and produces coffee, sugar, indigo, tobacco, salt, cotton, ginger, gums, wax, honey, and drugs. Its coasts and rivers are well supplied with fish and turtles; and the animals taken thither from Europe have multiplied prodigiously, supplying provisions, hides, and tallow. There are also mines of gold, talc, and crystal. This island was discovered by Columbus in 1492, and the Spaniards had full possession of it for 120 years, in the first 15 of which they reduced a million of inhabitants to 60,000. They were afterwards forced to divide the island with the French, who had the W. part till 1795, when the Spaniards ceded the whole to them. In 1791, an insurrection broke out in the French part, and in a short time 100,000 negroes were in arms; the manufactures and plantations appeared as one general conflagration, and the plains and mountains were covered with carnage. In 1797, the French directory invested Toussaint Louverture, an African by birth, with the office of commander in chief and governor general of the island. This man had made himself conspicuous by his abilities as a leader of the revolted negroes, and had gallantly defended the island against the British, who expected, from the prevailing anarchy, to have made an easy conquest of it. Toussaint was possessed of no ordinary talents; his administration was attended with the most happy effects in tranquillizing the island; and he gave it a constitution, on the model of a republic, acknowledging, indeed, a virtual dependence on France, but in reality operating on independent principles. In 1802, Napoleon Buonaparte, first consul of France, sent over an army of 25,000 men, to bring back St. Domingo to its former state. A sanguinary warfare of three months' continuance ensued, which was at last terminated by a proposal of terms, which Toussaint was willing to accede to. During the negotiation, however, he was decoyed on board a French ship, on an invitation to dine with the commander in chief, and was perfidiously put in irons, and conveyed to France, where he perished miserably. Two other black chiefs, Dessalines and Christophe, escaped the snare, and under them the negroes again flew to arms, and took a dreadful revenge on the French inhabitants, whom they indiscriminately massacred. Dessalines succeeded to the authority of Toussaint, and in 1804, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor of Hayti. In 1806, the chiefs began to war against each other, and the black emperor was killed. Christophe was elected chief in his place, and in 1811 was crowned by the style and title of Henry king of Hayti. He reigned 10 years, the greater part of which was spent in war with other chiefs, particularly Pethion and his successor Boyer, who maintained the republican form of government, with the title of president, at Port-au-Prince. In the mean time, such of the French as had escaped the massacre of 1802, kept possession of the E. part of the island till 1809, when the Spaniards, assisted by the British, finally expelled them. In 1821, Christophe's subjects, in conjunction with his guards, broke out in rebellion against him, and he lost his life, either by his own hands or those of his enemies. The republic has been since restored; and the authority of president Boyer generally acknowledged. By the treaty of Paris, in 1814, the French formally ceded this island to Spain; but European sovereignty is merely nominal. It lies between Cuba and Jamaica to the W. and Porto Pico to the E. St. Domingo, the capital, contains a population of 22,000 souls; and is seated in lat. 18. 28. N. lon. 69. 50. W.

DOMINICA, s. Palm-Sunday.

DOMINICA, an English West-India island, about 28 miles in length and 13 in breadth. It yields coffee, indigo, ginger, and other articles of West-India produce; but the soil, being thin, is more adapted to the rearing of cotton than sugar. In the woods are innumerable swarms of bees, which produce great quantities of wax and honey, and the island is well supplied with rivulets of water. It is divided into ten parishes. The only towns of note are Charlotte Town, or Rousseau, on the S. W. side of the island, and Portsmouth, at the head of Prince Rupert's Bay. There is no considerable bay or harbour, but the anchorage round the coast is commodious and safe, and ships find shelter under its capes. It lies about half way between Guadaloupe and Martinico, in lat. 15. 32. N. lon. 61. 23. W.

DOMINICAL, a. noting the Lord's day, or Sunday. The dominical letter, in Chronology, denotes the Sunday in almanacks, &c. throughout the year: of these letters there are seven, from A. to G. inclusive; and as in leap-years there is an intercalary day, two are then used, the first of which denotes every Sunday till the intercalary day, and the second all the Sundays which follow after it. The dominical letter for any particular year being known, it may be readily found for any succeeding one, by observing that they move in a retrograde order, so that if in any given year the Sunday-letter was D, in the following year, (provided it was not leap-year,) it would be C, in the next year after that, B, and so on: but in leap-years there are two of them used, as for example, in the year 1819 the dominical letter was C, in 1820 (being leap-year) BA in 1821, G, &c.

DOMINICANS, a religious order, called in France Jacobins, and in England Black Friars, or Preaching Friars. This order, founded by St. Dominic, a native of Spain, was approved of by Innocent III. in 1215, and confirmed by a bull of Honorius III. in 1216, under St. Austin's rules, and the founder's particular constitutions.

DOMINION, s. [dominium, Lat.] sovereignty; the exercise of power and authority. The space of ground or territory subject to a person, applied to place. Predominancy; preference. An order of angels, between thrones and principalities.

DOMINO, s. a hood worn by a canon of a cathedral. Also, a dress in form of a gown worn at masquerades.

DON, one of the principal rivers in Europe, which separates it on the S. E. from Asia. It rises near Epiphan, in the government of Tula, and falls by three streams into the Sea of Azof. Its whole course, including its numerous windings, is estimated at 700 miles. In the spring, it rises upwards of 16 feet, and overflows the neighbouring plains.

DONATIVE, s. [from donatif, Fr.] a gift, largess, or some considerable present. In the Canon Law, a benefice given by the patron to a priest without presentation to the ordinary, and without institution or induction. The king may found a church or chapel, and exempt it from the jurisdiction of the ordinary; or by letters patent he may license a common person to found such a church, and ordain it to be made a donative. There can be no lapse of such a benefice, though the bishop may compel such person to nominate a clerk by ecclesiastical censures, and the clerk must be qualified as other clerks of churches are.

DONCASTER, a spacious, populous town, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, with a market on Saturday, seated on the river Don, in the great road between London and York, containing 1874 houses, and 8857 males and 4687 females. It is governed by a mayor, and is a considerable wool market, and has manufactures of stockings, petticoats, knit waistcoats, gloves, and leather caps. It is 37 miles S. of York, and 161 N. by W. of London.

DRUID, s. [from deru, an oak, Celt.] the priests and ministers of religion amongst the Britons, Celtic Gauls, and Germans. They were in Britain the first and most distinguished order in the island, chosen out of the best families; and the honours of their birth, added to those of their function, procured them the highest veneration. They were versed in astronomy, geometry, natural philosophy, politics, and geography; had the administration of all sacred things; were the interpreters of the gods, and supreme judges in all causes, whether ecclesiastic or civil. From their determination was no appeal; and whoever refused to acquiesce in their decisions, were reckoned impious, and excommunicated. They were generally governed by a single person, called an Arch-druid, who presided in all their assemblies. Once a year they used to retire, or rather assemble in a wood, in the centre of the island, at which time they used to receive applications from all parts, and hear causes. Their peculiar opinions are not well ascertained by writers, though it is agreed by all, that they held the immortality of the soul, and its transmigration; that nothing could appease the gods more powerfully than human sacrifices; and that there was one supreme Deity, who presided over all others.

DRUM, s. [drumme, Erse] a warlike instrument made of thin pieces of oak, bent in a cylindrical form, covered at each end with vellum, or parchment, which stretches by means of braces running from one extremity to the other; and made to sound by beating one of the ends with sticks generally made of Brazil wood. A kettle-drum is made of brass or copper, in the form of a kettle, covered at the top with parchment. The drum of the ear, or tympanum, is a small membrane in the inner part of that organ, so stretched as to convey the sensation of sound, by the vibration which sounding bodies cause upon it. Formerly, a drum signified the same as a rout, in fashionable life.

To DRUM, v. a. to beat a tune on a drum with a stick. To beat, or vibrate, applied to the motion of the heart.

To DRUMBLE, v. n. to drone; to be sluggish.

DUBLIN, the capital of Ireland, in the county of the same name, and an archbishop's see, with an university. It is seated on the river Liffey, or Anna Liffey, in form of a square, two miles and a half on each side, and contains a population of 186,276 souls. The streets are generally spacious and regular; and there are several magnificent squares, the largest of which, St. Stephen's Green, is near a mile in circuit. It has a cathedral and a collegiate church, 18 parish-churches, 8 chapels, 16 Roman Catholic chapels, numerous meeting-houses for dissenters, four foreign churches, and a synagogue. Among the principal buildings are the castle (the residence of the viceroy), the rational bank (formerly the parliament house), Trinity college, the four courts, the royal exchange, the new custom-house, the royal hospital of Kilmalham for invalids, the linen hall, the tolsey, and Carlisle, Essex, and Sarah bridges, (three of the seven bridges over the Liffey.) The hospitals and other charitable institutions are numerous; and it has two theatres. The Phoenix park, at the west end of the city, is a royal enclosure, seven miles in circuit; and, besides the Hibernian school, is adorned with the villa of the viceroy, the seat of the principal secretary, and a few others; also a salute battery of 22 pieces of cannon, and the ammunition magazine. About four miles N. W. of the city, is an observatory, erected on a rocky hill; and at about the same distance on the other side is a beautiful pharos, called the Caissoon, rising, like the Eddystone lighthouse, from the sea. On the opposite promontory, called the hill of Howth, is another lighthouse. The approach to Dublin from the sea affords a most enchanting prospect; but the harbour is incommoded with two sand-banks, called Duplin bar, which prevent vessels of great burden from passing over. Three miles below the city, at a place called the Pigeon-house, is a commodious dock, where the packets, which sail daily to and from Holyhead, receive and land their passengers; and here his Majesty George IV. landed on the 12th August, 1821, when he visited Ireland. From the Caissoon, a mole or pier, nearly four miles in length, extends to Ringsend, to which the city is united by buildings: on the north side of this mole is the harbour, and on the south, near the town, are wharfs, principally used for bathing; and between these and the opposite shore is an extensive and smooth strand, which is dry at low water: there is a wharf also on the north side of the river, for bathers; and elegant baths are on both sides of the water. From Ringsend upwards, through the whole city, the river is embanked, with quays on both sides, forming beautiful and extensive promenades. Two canals pass from the Liffey, on the north and south sides of the city. (See CANALS.) The civil government of Dublin is vested in a lord mayor, recorder, two sheriffs, 24 aldermen, and 96 common council, formed of representatives from the 25 corporations. The city sends two members to parliament, and Trinity college one. Besides the silk, woollen, and cotton manufactures carried on in the suburbs, other branches of useful manufactures are establishing in various parts of the metropolis; and its foreign trade is considerable, though not so extensive as formerly. The city is supplied with water by means of pipes. A circular road about 10 or 11 miles in length encompasses it; and the surrounding country is pleasant. Dublin is seated at the head of a spacious bay, 7 miles from the Irish sea, 60 W. of Holyhead, in Wales, and 300 W. N. W. of London. Lat. 53. 21. N. lon. 6. 15. W.

DUKE, s. [dux, Lat.] is either the title of a sovereign prince, as the Duke of Savoy, Parma, &c. the Grand Duke of Tuscany, Baden, &c. or it is the title of honour and nobility next below princes. The commanders of armies in time of war, the governors of provinces, and wardens of marches, in times of peace, were called Dukes under the latter emperors. In Great Britain, Duke is a mere title of dignity, without giving any domain or territory, or conferring jurisdiction over the place from whence the title is taken. He is created by patent, cincture of sword, mantle of state, imposition of a cap, and coronet of gold on his head, and a verge of gold put into his hand. His title is Grace; and, in the style of the heralds, most high, potent, high-born, and noble Prince. Their eldest sons are, by courtesy, styled marquises, and their youngest, lords, with the addition of their christian names, as Lord George, Lord Robert, &c. and they take place of viscounts, though not so privileged by the laws of the land.

EA'STER, s. [eastre, Sax.] the time when Christians celebrate the resurrection of Christ from the grave. The word has no relation to this solemnity, but took its rise from Eastre, or Eostre, the name of the Saxon deity or goddess, whose festival was celebrated about this time of the year; and after its abolishment by Christianity, the name was retained, and is to this day used to signify the festival of Christ's resurrection.

EA'STERLY, a. coming from, lying, or looking towards the east.

EA'STERN, a. situated, looking, or tending towards the east, or that point of the compass in which the sun rises.

EAST GRINSTEAD, a borough in Sussex, with a market on Thursday, and a handsome church. It sends two members to parliament, and sometimes the assizes for the county are held here. It is seated on a hill, 20 miles N. of Lewes, and 29 S. by E. of London.

EAST-HARLING, a town in Norfolk, with a market on Tuesday, 24 miles S. W. of Norwich, and 89 N. E. of London.

EAST ILSLEY, a town in Berkshire, seated between two hills, among fruitful corn-fields, and excellent downs for feeding sheep. It has a market every Wednesday in the summer, chiefly for sheep; and is 14 miles N. W. of Reading, and 54 W. of London.

EAST-LOOE, a town of Cornwall, with a market on Saturday, seated pretty commodiously on a creek of the sea, over which it has a large stone bridge, leading to West Looe, which stands between two hills. They are both corporations, and send each two members to parliament. The chief benefit which the inhabitants have is in their fishery. They are 16 miles W. of Plymouth, and 231 W. by S. of London.

EA'STWARD, a. [eastweard, Sax.] towards the east, or that point of the compass where the sun rises when in the equinoctial points.

EA'SY, a. to be performed without fatigue, incumbrance, or difficulty; not difficult; free from disturbance or anxiety; quiet; unmolested; believing without inquiry or opposition; credulous; complying; free from bodily pain; unconstrained; without formality; ready; elegantly negligent.

To EAT, v. a. [preter. ate or eat, participle eat or eaten; etan, Sax.] to devour or consume by the mouth. ECHINATE, or ECHINATED, e-kî-nate, or e-ki-na-ted, part. or a. [from echinus, Lat.] bristled like a hedgehog; set with prickles.

ECHINUS, e-ki-nus, s. [Lat.] a hedgehog; a shell-fish set with prickles. In Botany, the prickly head or cover of the seed or top of any plant. In Architecture, a member or ornament near the bottom of the Ionic and other capitals, next to the abacus; taking its name from the roughness of its carving, resembling the prickly rind of a chesnut, or the prickly coat of a hedgehog; it is called ovolo by the Italians, and eggs and anchors by English workmen, because carved with anchors, darts, and ovals or eggs.

ECHO, ek-ko, s. [ἠχώ, Gr.] a sound reverberated, or reflected to the ear from some solid body. In Music, the repeating some parts of the strain in a very low or soft tone. By the Poets, Echo is supposed to be a nymph who pined into a sound for love of Narcissus.

To E'CHO, v. n. to resound; to be sounded back a second time. Actively, to multiply a sound.

ECCLAIRCISSEMENT, ek-lair-seez-mong, s. [Fr.] the act of clearing up, or explaining any affair by word of mouth.

ECLAT, e-klaw, s. [Fr.] splendour; lustre, or glory.

ECLÉCTIC, a. [ἐκλεκτικός, Gr.] selecting; or having the power of choosing or preferring.

ECLÉGMA, s. [from ἐκ and λείχειν, Gr.] a form of medicine made by the incorporation of oils with syrups, and which is to be taken upon a liquorice stick.

ECLIPSE, s. [ἐκλειψις, Gr.] in Astronomy, the darkening of one of the luminaries, by the interposition of some opaque body between it and the eye, or between it and the moon. The sun is eclipsed by the moon's intervening between the earth and the sun. An eclipse of the moon is when the earth, being between the sun and moon, hinders the light of the sun from falling upon her: if the light of the sun be kept off from the whole body of the moon, it is a total eclipse; if from a part only, it is a partial one. A state of darkness, or want of knowledge, applied to the mind.

To ECLIPSE, v. a. to darken any luminary. Figura- tively, to destroy any light; to drown a lesser light by superior splendour; to cloud; to obscure; to disgrace.

ECLIPTIC, s. [from ἐκλειπτικός, Gr.] in Astronomy, a great circle of the sphere, supposed to be drawn through the middle of the zodiac, making an angle with the equinoctial, in the points of Aries and Libra, of about 23° 28', which is the sun's greatest declination; or, more strictly speaking, it is the path or way, among the fixed stars, that the earth appears to describe to an eye placed in the sun. Some call it the way of the sun; because the sun, in his apparent annual motion, never deviates from it, as all the other planets do, more or less. It is called ecliptic, because eclipses of the sun and moon happen when they are in or near it. In Geography, it is a great circle on the terrestrial globe, not only answering to, but falling within, the plane of the celestial ecliptic.

ÉCLOGUE, ek-log, s. [ἐκλογή, Gr.] a pastoral poem whose scenes are confined to rural life, and whose personages are shepherds, or goatherds.

ECO'NOMY, s. See ŒCONOMY.

ECPHRACTICS, ek-frak-tiks, s. [from ἐκ and φράττω, Gr.] such medicines as open the vessels through which the humours are to pass, or which render tough humours thin, and thereby promote their discharge.

EDE'NTATED, a. [edentatus, Lat.] deprived of teeth.

EDE'SSA, a town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, once the residence of the Macedonian kings. It is seated near the Visticza, 44 miles W. N. W. of Salonica. Lon. 22. 3. E. lat. 40. 50. N.

E'DGAR, (son of Edmund) succeeded his brother in 959, when he was 16 years of age. His reign was one continual calm, without any wars or commotions, which was owing to his vast preparations both by sea and land, so that none dared to attack him, and without striking a stroke, he obliged the kings of Wales, Ireland, and the Isle of Man, to acknowledge him for their sovereign; and it is said, that he was rowed down the river Dee by eight kings, his vassals, he himself sitting at the helm. There was another circumstance also which tended to keep things quiet during all Edgar's reign; and that was, his being the greatest patron of the monks, who had it in their power to preserve peace. He recalled Dunstan, and made him archbishop of Canterbury. The secular priests were expelled the monasteries, and the regulars put in their room; these latter were also again put in possession of the ecclesiastical benefices, and the seculars ejected. He contrived a good expedient to clear the country of wolves, which were then very numerous, and made terrible havoc among the flocks. Instead of the tributes of gold, silver, and cattle, paid him by the Welsh, he ordered them, in 961, to bring him every year 300 wolves' heads; and published throughout England, a general pardon to all criminals, on condition they brought him, by such a time, a certain number of wolves' tongues, in proportion to their several crimes; so that in three years' time there was not one left. He also freed the nation from the worst kind of wolves, corrupt and unjust judges and magistrates. This king married Elfrida, the daughter of the earl of Devonshire; the story contains somewhat extraordinary. Edgar hearing that Ordgar earl of Devonshire had a daughter named Elfrida, esteemed the greatest beauty in England, he was resolved to make her his wife, if she answered the description; and sent earl Ethelwold, his favourite, to bring him an account. Ethelwold, upon seeing the young lady, fell desperately in love with her himself, and privately married her. Upon his return, he told the king there was nothing extraordinary in her; whereupon the king laid aside his design of marrying her. Ethelwold one day represented to the king, that, though Elfrida was not fit for a king, yet she was so great a fortune, that it would be a vast advantage to a subject, and so got the king's leave to marry her; upon which his marriage was solemnized publicly. However, Edgar was informed of Ethelwold's treachery; upon which he was resolved to see her himself; and going into those parts where Ethelwold kept her, upon some pretence or other, he told Ethelwold he desired to see his wife. Ethelwold was quite confounded at this, but he could not prevent it. As soon as the king saw her he was quite enamoured with her beauty, and was resolved to be revenged on the perfidious earl. Soon after, Ethelwold was found murdered in a wood. Edgar shortly after was married to Elfrida, by whom he left one son, Ethelred, who succeeded his brother Edward. Edgar died, 975, in the 32d year of his age, having reigned about 16 years after Edwy's death: he was buried at Glastonbury. Edgar was a prince of a very mixed character, in which the vicious passions very often predominated. Though we grant him to have been a sound politician, an excellent legislator, and a monarch whose abilities were employed for the benefit of his country, we must own at the same time that he ascended the throne of Mercia by the most flagrant injustice; that he was superstitious in his religion, lawless in his passions, and bloody in his revenge; for, exclusive of the vengeance upon Ethelwold, he destroyed the whole Isle of Thanet with fire and sword, because a few of the inhabitants had been concerned in plundering some merchants from York. He extended his liberality to men of learning and genius; his court was hospitable and magnificent, and generally filled with a concourse of foreigners, who were charmed with his elegance and politeness; and, from the tranquillity of his reign, he acquired the title of Edgar the Pacific.

EDGE, s. [ecge, Sax.] the sharp side of any cutting instrument; a narrow part arising from one which is broader; the extremity, border, or outside of a thing; intenseness of desire; keenness; acrimony of temper. To set the teeth on edge, means to cause a tingling pain in the teeth.

To EDGE, v. a. to sharpen, or make an instrument cut better; to border, or put something round the extremities of a thing; to exasperate; to excite; to put in such a position as to make way or give room; to advance beyond a line, or situation. Neuterly, to advance, or move forward against any obstacle, or body moving in an opposite direction; to go close upon a wind, and sail slow.

EDIFICATION, s. [edificatio, Lat.] improvement; instruction; the act of advancing a person in religion.

EDIFICE, s. [edificium, Lat.] a building or house, generally applied to signify some large or pompous building.

EDIFIER, s. one who improves another by instruction.

To EDIFY, v. a. [edifico, Lat.] to build. To improve by instruction; to instruct, or teach.

EDILE, s. [edilis, Lat.] the title of an officer among the Romans, who resembled in many particulars our justice of the peace, or the city-marshal in London.

EDINBURGH, a city, the capital of Scotland, situated in a county to which it gives name, on three hills. It may properly be divided into the Old and New Towns. The situation of the Old Town is singular and striking: it stands on the middle ridge, or hill, which is narrow and steep, and terminated abruptly on the W. by the castle, a very ancient building, accessible only by a drawbridge, and erected on a lofty precipitous rock. The High Street, a mile in length, and generally 90 feet broad, extends from the Castle to Holyrood House. On each side of this steep hill the houses form narrow lanes, which are called Closes, and extend N. and S. Many of them are lofty; but so piled, as it were, upon each other, that they are neither commodious nor elegant. The New Town is situated on the side of the Old, on an elevated plain, from which the ground descends to the S. and N. with a gentle declivity. It forms an assemblage of uniform streets and squares, including several public buildings, the whole built entirely of stone, with considerable taste and elegance. The buildings on the S. side of the Old Town, though inferior to those on the N. are extensive and stately. The most striking object here is the New College, built by public subscription, on the site of the old one, on a large and magnificent plan. The number of students in the university is estimated at 1000, of whom 400 study medicine. The University of Edinburgh is celebrated throughout the world; and its medical school, in particular, is entitled to the first rank. The High School of Edinburgh has also been long famous for the scholars it has produced. The city is governed by a lord provost, a guild council, and 25 common council, but, though the metropolis of Scotland, it sends but one representative to parliament. Here are 14 incorporated trades, each having its deacon or warden. Edinburgh has numerous manufactures, and particularly of fine linen and cambric. The principal public buildings are, the palace of Holyrood House, the Royal Exchange, built in 1753, the Post Office, the Register Office, the Physicians' Hall, Herriot's Hospital, founded in 1628, for the education of 140 poor boys, Watson's Hospital, for the sons of decayed merchants, an hospital for orphans, and a Royal Infirmary, in-incorporated by charter in 1736. Edinburgh contains, with Leith, about 139,000 inhabitants, and is supplied with water, conveyed in cast-iron pipes from Commiston, 4 miles to the W. A constant guard in uniform, are kept in the guard-house, who patrol the streets every night. It is two miles S. S. W. of Leith, which is its port, 54 W. N. W. of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and 377 N. by W. of London. Lat. 55. 56. N. lon. 3. 12. W.

EDINBURGHSHIRE, or Mid Lothian, a populous, well cultivated, fertile, and pleasant county of Scotland, 27 miles in length, and from 6 to 16 in breadth; bounded on the N. by the Frith of Forth, which separates it from Fifeshire; on the E. by the shires of Haddington and Berwick; on the S. by those of Selkirk, Peebles, and Lanerk; and on the W. by the shire of Linlithgow. It is divided into 41 parishes, and in 1821 contained 191,514 inhabitants. The soil is fertile in corn and grass; and in the earth are found coals, iron, limestone, and black marble. The principal rivers are the Esk, Leith, Amond, and Gala.

EDITION, s. [editio, Lat.] the publication or impression of a book; republication.

EDITOR, s. one who prepares a work for the press, and examines the proof-sheets while it is printing.

EDMONTON, a village 7 miles N. of London, containing about 7500 inhabitants.

EDMUND, I. the eldest of Edward the Elder's legitimate sons, was about 18 years of age when he came to the crown of England. No sooner had Edmund begun his reign, but the restless Danes prepared for a revolt; and Anlaff, who had fled to Ireland after his late defeat, returned; being furnished with troops from Olaus, king of Norway, he recovered Northumberland, and marched into Mercia; and by the assistance of his countrymen got possession of several places which Edward had taken from them. King Edmund marched towards the north, and engaged Anlaff near Chester; and was preparing to renew the fight next day; but the archbishops of Canterbury and York, who were in the two armies, obtained a treaty to be concluded by break of day, by which Edmund yielded up to the Danes all the country north of Watling-street. King Edmund did not like this treaty, but was forced by the nobles to comply with it. Some time after, Anlaff and Reginald, who had likewise been elected kings, the Mercians, Danes, and the king of Cumberland, with one consent, took up arms, in order to shake off the English yoke. As soon as Edmund had intelligence of these proceedings, he marched into Mercia, and took some towns, and put the Danes into such consternation, that the two kings fled out of the island. The Danes upon this threw down their arms, and swore allegiance to Edmund. Then he subdued Cumberland, and gave it to the king of Scotland to fix him in his interest; but reserved the sovereignty of it to himself, and obliged the Scottish king to do him homage for it. Edmund did not long enjoy the fruits of his victories; for as he was celebrating the festival of the conversion of the Saxons, at Pucklekirk, in Gloucestershire, one Leolf, a notorious robber, who had been banished for his crimes, impudently came and seated himself in the hall where the king was at dinner. Edmund, provoked at his insolence, ordered him to be seized; but perceiving he was drawing his dagger to defend himself, the king started up in a great rage, and taking hold of him by the hair, dragged him out of the hall; and whilst he was wholly engaged in venting his passion, Leolf stabbed him to the heart, so that he fell dead on the spot, in the 8th year of his reign, A. D. 948, leaving behind him two sons, Edwy and Edgar, by Elgiva his wife. Some of this king's laws, still in being, shew how much he regarded the good of his subjects. Among the rest, he ordered, that in gangs of robbers, the oldest of them should be hanged; which was the first law in England that punished robbery with death, the punishment before being only pecuniary. Though Edmund reigned but about eight years, yet in that short period he exhibited specimens of extraordinary courage, ability, and regard for the welfare of his subjects.

EDMUND, surnamed Ironside, succeeded Ethelred II. in 1016. Upon his father's death, the city of London, and all the lords that were there, proclaimed him king of England, whilst the Danes, and all the places in their possession, declared for Canute; but a great many of the English who were among them came over to Edmund. Canute's first attempt was upon London, as being Edmund's chief support, which he besieged three times, but without success. Before the last of these sieges, a great battle was fought, in which both kings eminently displayed their courage and conduct, and the two armies parted at last with equal loss on both sides; though the English were in danger of being worsted, by a stratagem of the false Edric, who was now on the side of the Danes: he cut off the head of a soldier who resembled Edmund, held it upon the top of his lance, in sight of the English, and cried, "Fly, fly, you scoundrels; behold the head of your king in whom you trust!" This would infallibly have occasioned their defeat, if Edmund had not shewed himself with his helmet off, and so revived the courage of his soldiers, which by Edric's artifice began to droop. The battle lasted till night, and Edmund prepared to renew it the next morning; but Canute marched off in the night, and went and besieged London a third time. Five pitched battles were fought with various success; in the last, Edric, who had reconciled himself to Edmund, went over to the Danes with the body of forces he commanded, which put the English into such consternation, that they threw down their arms and fled. Nevertheless, Edmund drew together a very powerful army, and marched towards Gloucester, in quest of the enemy; Canute advanced towards him, in order to give him battle. The two kings stood in view of each other, at the head of their respective armies. At last Edmund proposed to Canute, that in order to prevent the effusion of blood, they two should decide the quarrel by single combat. The circumstances relating to this affair are very uncertain. However, the result was, that a peace was concluded, by the partition of the kingdom: Edmund was to have Wessex, i. e. all south of the Thames, with London and a part of the ancient kingdom of Essex; and Canute to have Mercia, Northumberland, and East-Anglia. The valiant and generous king Edmund did not enjoy his share quite a year, being murdered by the procurement of the villain Edric, duke of Mercia, and his brother-in-law, who, being conscious what a false traitor he had been, feared the union of the two kings might be destructive to him; he immediately hastened to tell Canute what he had done, who had the greatest abhorrence of so barbarous an action, though he dissembled it for the present, and promised to advance Edric above all the peers of the realm. He was as good as his word; for, not long after, he ordered him to be beheaded, his body to be thrown into the Thames, and his head to be fixed on the highest gate in London. Edmund left two sons, Edmund and Edward, by his wife Algitha. He was buried at Glastonbury; and with him the Saxon monarchy in England in a manner ended, having lasted 190 years from Egbert's establishment; 432 from the foundation of the heptarchy; and 568 from the arrival of Hengist. This prince, during his short reign, exhibited proofs of the most undaunted courage, invincible fortitude, consummate prudence, and sublime generosity.

EDRED, succeeded Edmund I. in 948. The Danes, according to their usual custom upon the accession of a new king, began to revolt, and gained over to their side Malcolm, king of Scotland; but Edred marched into Northumberland, and obliged them to sue for peace; upon which Malcolm struck up a peace with Edred, and paid him the stipulated homage. But the Danes would not yet be quiet; he therefore marched into the north, made a terrible slaughter among the rebels, and laid waste the country for several miles. Edric fled into Scotland, and the Northumbrians threw themselves upon Edred for mercy; he generously replaced Edric on the throne, only imposing a tribute on him, and making him swear allegiance to him. But the perfidious Danes laid an ambush for him, as he was returning towards Wessex, and fell suddenly on his rear. Exasperated to the last degree, he returned, divested Northumberland of its royalty, and reduced it to a province; making earl Osulf, an Englishman, the first governor. Edred, now absolute lord of all England, governed his kingdom in perfect tranquillity, and turned his thoughts wholly to religion, wherein he was implicitly directed by Dunstan, abbot of Glastonbury, who had in every thing the ascendant over him: by his advice he rebuilt Glastonbury church and monastery; he also rebuilt Croyland and Abington monasteries. Edred died in the 10th year of his reign, in 958.

To EDUCATE, v. a. [educō, Lat.] to bring up a person; to give instruction to a person during his minority.

EDWARD the Elder, succeeded Alfred, in the year 900. Ethelward, son to Alfred's elder brother Ethelbert, aimed at the crown; but meeting with no encouragement from the English, he applied himself to the Danes, who immediately proclaimed him king of England, pretending, as they were possessed of half the kingdom, they had as much right to make a king as the West-Saxons. Edward marched directly against them, and they were obliged to abandon their new made king Ethelward, and banish him out of their country. Ethelward went over to France, and in a short time returned with a large body of Normans, landed them in Essex, and soon made himself master of that province. This encouraged the Danes to take up arms again in his favour. Edward obtained many victories in this war. Ethelward was slain in battle in 905, in which battle (which was very obstinate and bloody on both sides) king Edward lost many of his nobles, and the Danes their king Eolrick. They continued the war two years after, yet they were constrained at last to sue for peace, which they obtained, on condition they would own Edward as their sovereign, and the Normans should return to France. In 910 the war broke out again, and Edward soon beat the Danes in two engagements, and at last quite expelled them out of the kingdom of Mercia. This war lasted, with some intervals of respite, 12 years, in which time a great number of battles were fought, and the Danes continually lost ground, till Edward obliged them to lay down their arms, and acknowledge him once more as their sovereign. After the peace was concluded with the Danes, A. D. 922, Edward marched against the Welsh, obtained a signal victory over them, and compelled the Welsh king Rees ap Madoc to sue for peace, promising to pay the usual tribute for the future. The Cumberland Britons likewise submitted to Edward. He died in the 25th year of his reign, A. D. 925, and was interred at Winchester.

EDWARD the Younger, succeeded Edgar in 974. There were great contentions about the succession. The monks and their party were for Edward, Edgar's eldest son, now about 14 years of age: and the nobles, who were uneasy at the power and great wealth heaped upon the monks, were for Ethelred. In the mean time, Dunstan, fearing to be outvoted, taking advantage of the favour of the people, who had an high opinion of his sanctity, rises on a sudden, and leads prince Edward by the hand towards the church, and there anoints him king. The nobles murmured at this; but seeing he had the people to back him, they were forced to acquiesce. Dunstan immediately assumed the regency. King Edward, after he had reigned little more than three years, came to a tragical end in 979. As he was one day returning from hunting, and came near Corfe-castle, in the isle of Purbeck, in Dorsetshire, where his step-mother Elfrida and her son Ethelred resided, he rode off from his company to pay her a visit. Elfrida being informed the king was at the gate, ran to receive him, and pressed him to alight. As he only designed to pay his respects to her as he passed by, he desired a glass of wine to drink her health: which being brought to him as he sat on his horse, the unsuspecting king no sooner lifted the glass to his mouth, but a villain, at the private instigation of the cruel queen, stabbed him in the back with a dagger. He was succeeded by Ethelred, 12 years of age.

EDWARD, the Confessor, son of Ethelred and Emma, succeeded Hardicanute, June 8, 1041. He had spent great part of his life in Normandy. Godwin, who had made him swear that he would marry his daughter, convened a general assembly, and got Edward acknowledged and proclaimed king of England. Edward was a man of weak understanding, which gave Godwin an opportunity of rising to an exorbitant height of power. He bore a very great hatred against Godwin and his whole family in his heart, which was the reason of his deferring his marriage with his daughter Editha as long as possible; however, after a delay of two years, as he really stood in fear of her father, he espoused her, but never consummated the marriage. He went hastily to Windsor, where his mother's treasures lay, seized them all, and stript her of every thing, leaving her only a small pension for life, and had her confined ten years like a prisoner at Winchester, where she died 1052. Several circumstances concurring, the king and Godwin came at last to an open rupture; but what brought things to a crisis, was the following incident: Eustace, earl of Boloign, having paid a visit to king Edward, was returning to France, and at Dover, one of his people picked a quarrel with a townsman, and killed him. This occasioned a great insurrection of the inhabitants, in which 20 of the earl's people lost their lives. Upon this the king ordered Godwin to go with some troops, and chastise the rioters; but he absolutely refused, saying, justly, that it was not the custom of England to punish men unheard. Edward now came to a fixed resolution to punish the earl for this disobedience; Godwin, having intelligence of it, raised forces to defend himself. However, by the advice of a general assembly convened at Gloucester, a peace was patched up for the present; but it did not last long; for Godwin and his sons, refusing to appear before the general assembly, were banished the realm, and accordingly they passed over sea. They returned in a hostile manner, and entered the Thames with a fleet of ships; but an accommodation was once more agreed on. A little after, William the Bastard, Duke of Normandy, arrived in England, to pay a visit to king Edward. In 1051, Edward abolished for ever the tax called Danegeld, which amounted to 40,000*l.* a year, and had been paid for 38 years. In 1053 earl Godwin died. In 1054 the Welsh made an inroad into England, and plundered Hereford; but earl Harold, son of Godwin, marched against them with an army he had himself raised, put them to the rout, and drove them out of the country, which raised him very much in the esteem of the people, and they began to talk openly that no man was so worthy to succeed to the crown as Harold. The king, to defeat Harold's hopes, sent for his nephew Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, out of Hungary; he accordingly came over to England, with his son Edgar Atheling, and his two daughters, 1057; but died soon after his arrival. In 1063 the Welsh again renewed their incursions, and were again repulsed by Harold and his brother Toston, who obliged them to dethrone Griffin, and become tributary to England. The Northumbrians, being grievously oppressed by Toston their earl, rose up in arms, and expelled him their country. Harold was sent to chastise them, and restore his brother; but the people made such remonstrances to him of Toston's ill government, that he obtained their pardon, and procured another governor. This entirely gained him the affections of the whole people, for his equity and justice. Whilst Harold was using all the address he was master of to procure his succession to the crown, king Edward gave himself no trouble about it, but was wholly engaged in building the church and monastery of Westminster. He just lived to see them finished, and the ceremony of their dedication performed; and dying in the 24th year of his reign, A. D. 1065, was buried in the sepulchre he had provided for himself in Westminster-abbey; which he built. He was the last king of Egbert's race, though not the last Saxon king, since Harold was of that nation, though not of the blood royal. The mental qualities of Edward did not at all answer to the dignity of his person. He was weak, indolent, and irresolute, and the attachment to his own ease tended in a great measure to the tranquillity of his reign. He seems to have been void of natural affection, and indeed of every other passion that kindles any warm emotion in the human heart. He was equally free from pride and ostentation, moderate in his appetites, complacent in his deportment, charitable to the poor, and extremely punctual in the performance of all religious duties: so that he acquired among the vulgar the title of Saint and Confessor, by which epithet he was canonized by pope Alexander III. about 200 years after his death. His prophecies and revelations are no other than the dreams of superstition; and, as for his curing scrofulous ulcers and tumors by the touch, the sensible part of mankind is by this time very well convinced, that neither he who exercised this apostolic function, in imitation of the French kings, nor any of his successors, ever contributed to the recovery of one patient, by any inherent personal virtue derived from heaven. The passive humanity, or rather easiness of his temper, appears from some private incidents of his life, which are very often more characteristic than those transactions of importance which are the effects of counsel and deliberation. One day, while he reposed himself upon a couch, a page, who little dreamed that he was in the apartment, finding an iron chest open, filled his pockets with the silver it contained; but not satisfied with his booty, he had recourse to it again; when the king, thinking him perhaps too unconscionable, "Boy, (said he very deliberately,) you had better be satisfied with what you have got; for if Hugolin, my chamberlain, should come in, you will lose the whole, and be severely whipt into the bargain." Before the reign of Edward, the countries of Wessex, Mercia, and Northumberland, were governed by their own peculiar laws; but he reduced them all into one body, and ordained that they should be observed in common through the whole kingdom. These were called Edward's laws, in contradistinction to those of the Norman kings, which were introduced in the sequel.

EDWARD I. eldest son of Henry III. who succeeded to the crown of England upon the death of his father, Nov. 16, 1272, was at that time on his return from the Holy Land, and was crowned Aug. 19, 1274, with Eleanor his queen, sister to the queen of Castille, who had attended him in his expedition; Alexander III. king of Scotland, the duke of Bretagne, and all the lords of the realm, being present at the solemnity; on which occasion 500 horses were let loose about the country, for all that could catch them to keep them. The first thing he did after his coronation, was to rectify the abuses in the administration of justice, and the parliament enacted some good laws, which were called the statutes of Westminster. Afterwards he marched with a great army into Wales, and made Llewellyn their prince, who had attempted to throw off the yoke, sue for peace, which was granted on hard terms: but Edward afterwards generously relaxed them, being satisfied with thus mortifying his enemy. In 1279, the earldom of Ponthieu and Montreuil fell to Edward, in right of his queen, upon the death of the queen of Castille her mother. The coin having been very much adulterated, and information having been given that the Jews were chiefly concerned in it, the king caused all that were in the nation to be seized in one day, and 280 of them, being convicted of clipping and coining, received sentence of death, and were executed accordingly. About this time the statute of mortmain passed, to put a stop to the prevailing practice of persons alienating their lands to the church. In 1289 (though some say several years after) the statute of Quo Warranto was passed, occasioned by many persons, during the late troubles, appropriating lands to themselves to which they had no right, by which statute they were obliged to shew their claim; but the king, either through ill advice, or the desire of keeping up money, issued out a proclamation for all that held lands of the crown to lay their title before the judges. The earl of Warren appearing, and being required to shew his title to the lands, drew out an old rusty sword, and said, "It was by this my ancestors gained their estate, and by this I will keep it as long as I live." This brave and bold answer opened the king's eyes, and, thinking better of the matter, he recalled the proclamation. Llewellyn, having revolted, at the instigation of his brother David, committed great ravages on the borders, and defeated the king's generals; but Edward, marching with a numerous army into Wales, totally routed Llewellyn's forces in a great battle, in which Llewellyn himself was slain; and the king caused his head, crowned with ivy, to be exposed to view on the walls of the Tower of London. David his brother, the last of his race, was cruelly put to death as a traitor, and his head fixed up by his brother's, and his four quarters sent to York, Bristol, Northampton, and Winchester. After the defeat of Llewellyn, Edward with ease became master of the whole country, and Wales was united to the crown of England in 1283. The Queen lay in at Carnarvon, where she was brought to bed of a prince, named Edward, who, when he was 17 years of age, was invested with the principality of Wales; and from that time the king's eldest son has been always Prince of Wales. In 1287, king Edward, leaving the regency to the earl of Pembroke, went over to France, where he staid three years. Being returned into England in 1289, he set about reforming abuses in the administration of justice, punished several judges who were found guilty of taking bribes, and obliged them to swear for the future they would take neither money nor presents, but a moderate breakfast. The next year the Jews were all banished the kingdom. Upon the death of Alexander III. there arose great disputes in Scotland about the succession. The chief of the claimants were John Baliol and Edward Bruce, who, in order to prevent a civil war, chose the king of England arbitrator of their differences; but, before he could proceed to a decision, he declared that he acted in this affair as sovereign lord of all Scotland, and required the states to own him as such, which, though they never expressly did, yet they did not directly oppose his pretensions: however, he was owned as sovereign by all the claimants, and decided in favour of Baliol, whom he declared king of Scotland; upon which he swore fealty, and did homage to king Edward. But Baliol, being afterwards absolved from his oath of fealty by the pope, upon the king of England's treating him in an imperious manner, was determined to throw off the yoke; and took the opportunity of Edward's being at war with France to send a letter to him, renouncing the homage he had paid him; which so exasperated him, that in 1296 he marched his army designed for France into Scotland, and made himself master of that kingdom, and Baliol came and resigned his crown to him. Edward returned to England, carrying with him the crown and sceptre of Scotland, with the rest of the regalia, and the famous stone of Scone, on which the inauguration of the kings was performed. Prince Edward, being left regent on the king's going to Flanders, having assembled the parliament, which granted him a large subsidy, confirmed king John's two charters by an authentic act, which the king put the great seal to in Flanders. While the king was abroad the Scots revolted, and drove the English out of all their strong places in Scotland, leaving them only the single town of Berwick upon Tweed. Edward, upon this, returned forthwith to England, and met the enemy at Falkirk, where he totally routed them, retook all the strong places he had lost, and returned to England. This was in 1298. The next year the whole kingdom rose, and drove the English once more out of Scotland. Edward, enraged at this, entered that kingdom a third time, in 1300, and entirely routed the Scotch army. Edward refusing to accept their offers of submission, the Scots, in despair, offered the sovereignty of their country to Boniface VIII. who readily accepted of it. But Edward had so little regard to the pope's pretensions, that he swore if he heard any more of them, he would destroy Scotland from sea to sea: however, at the instance of the king of France, he granted the Scots a truce; but, on the expiration of it, he sent an army into Scotland, which being divided into three parts to ravage the country, were all routed in one day. Having now concluded a peace with France, in 1303, by which Guienne was restored to Edward, he entered Scotland with so numerous an army, that he met with no resistance, and penetrated to the utmost bounds of the island, laying waste the country on all sides, and took Stirling castle. At his return into England he publicly imprisoned Prince Edward his son, for having committed some outrage against the bishop of Litchfield. The Scots, though often subdued, revolted again, and were again subdued. Edward, upon his return, banished Gaveston, as a corrupter of the Prince, and made the Prince swear never to recall him.

The Scots again took up arms under Bruce, who attacked the earl of Pembroke, the king's general in Scotland, defeated him, and took the earl prisoner; after which he gained several other advantages. Edward was now so exasperated against the Scots, that he made vast preparations to destroy them; but he was seized with a distemper at Carlisle, and died at Burgh upon the Sands, in Cumberland, on July 7, 1307, aged 68 years, having reigned 34 years, 7 months, and 20 days. When he was near his end, he advised his son to carry his bones at the head of his army, assuring him the rebels could never withstand the sight of them. He ordered him to send his heart to the Holy Land, with 32,000*l.* for the maintenance of the holy sepulchre, and commanded him never to recall Gaveston. The constitution of parliament, such as it is at this day, was so well established in his reign, that an additional law was made to the great charter, which enacted that no tax should be levied on the people without the consent of the commons. He had, by Eleanor of Castille, four sons and nine daughters; but Edward his successor was the only one of his sons who survived him. By Margaret of France, his second wife, he had two sons and a daughter. Eleanor his queen died in 1297, in memory of whom he erected a cross wherever her corpse rested in the way from Lincolnshire to Westminster. Edward was tall, graceful, and majestic; his constitution was robust and vigorous; and his features were regular and elegant. He excelled in all those accomplishments which captivate the affections of the superficial admirers of exterior performances. He distinguished himself above most of his contemporaries, by his activity and skill in equestrian exercises, in the sports of the field, and in the manœuvres of chivalry. His address was engaging, and his elegance of manners attracted the admiration of those who enjoyed his society. In conversation he was affable, eloquent, and persuasive; mingling the effusions of pleasantry with the most pertinent observations. In private life, he was a strict observer of the laws of honour, and of the dictates of truth. He was a pattern of filial piety, a chaste and affectionate husband, a kind though vigilant parent, an humane and friendly master.—“By his ability and courage,” says a modern writer, “he eminently contributed to the suppression of an alarming rebellion, which had shaken to the centre the throne of his imbecile father. By his policy and judgment, he had imparted strength to the government, and vigour to the execution of the laws, which, amidst the indolence and neglect of Henry, had been rarely enforced. To the laurels acquired in his native country, he had added the fame of gallant exploits in the plains of Asia; and had revived among the infidels in Palestine the memory of English valour.” The same author pleasantly remarks, that the strength of his constitution appears from his procreative powers; for his last child was begotten after he had entered into his sixty-seventh year.” He was celebrated for his judgment, penetration, prudence, and sagacity. He was so cautious and circumspect, that he never brought himself into any dilemma; and possessed such presence of mind, that, when by a concurrence of unavoidable and disastrous circumstances he was involved in any difficulty, he never failed to extricate himself with equal honour and address. His noble achievements in Palestine, France, Wales, and Scotland, pronounce him an accomplished general; nor was he less distinguished for his legislative capacity. His merit as a legislator procured him the appellation of the Justinian of England; for, not to mention the many excellent statutes which were promulgated during his reign, he reformed the administration of justice, and ascertained the proper limits between the different courts of judicature; introduced a new and easy method of collecting the public taxes; reduced the extravagant power of the pope and clergy; and enacted many wise and salutary laws for preserving the peace of the kingdom, and maintaining order and regularity among his subjects. But, whatever his panegyrists may have said, Edward's character is far from being free from blemish or imperfection. There are some vices in the composition of this prince, which render his claim to extravagant commendation much weaker than that of many other princes. These were, disregard to justice where his own passions were concerned, an immoderate ambition, propensity to despotic acts, and an occasional adoption of sentiments of barbarity and revenge. These imputations on his memory are sufficiently proved by the genuine narrative of his reign.

EDWARD II. king of England, was about 22 years of age when he succeeded his father Edward I. and began his reign by recalling Gaveston, a native of Gascony, the debaucher of his youth, contrary to his father's last command, and his own oath; on whom he heaped numberless favours. He married Isabella of France, daughter of Philip the Fair, at Boulogne, and appointed Gaveston guardian of the realm during his absence; which so exasperated the barons, that they entered into a league to prevent his coronation upon his return; but, on his promising in the next parliament to grant them all they could desire, he was crowned by the bishop of Winchester, February 24, 1308, when he took an oath to preserve the laws, customs, and liberties granted to the clergy and people by St. Edward. However, Gaveston still governed with an absolute sway, and behaved with great insolence; which so provoked the lords, that they got the parliament to join with them to demand Gaveston's banishment, which the king finding he could not avoid, made him governor of Ireland. However, he was soon recalled; upon which the barons obliged the king to place the government in the hands of 21 lords (called ordainers) chosen by parliament, who banished Gaveston; but he was soon recalled, as before. And now several of the noblemen, entering into a confederacy, raised forces, and marched to York, where the king with his favourite were taking their diversions; but upon notice of their approach, he left the place. Gaveston was taken some days after in Scarborough castle, and, after a hasty trial, beheaded; and an accommodation was afterwards effected between the king and the barons, and peace restored in 1313. The same year the queen was delivered of a son, who was named Edward. The Scots taking advantage of the commotions in England, drove the English out of their country. On July 25, 1314, was fought the battle of Bannockburn, in which the English army was totally routed, with a dreadful slaughter; and the Scots made several incursions into England, and ravaged the borders in a terrible manner, till a truce was made for two years. Another war was upon the point of breaking out between the king and the barons, when matters were made up in 1321. In 1323 king Edward marched his army into Scotland; but was obliged to retreat for want of provisions, and the Scots pursued him, and ravaged the country to the very walls of York: at last a truce was agreed on for thirteen years. The lords, jealous of the king, placed a young gentleman, named Hugh Spencer, about him as a spy, and got him made high-chamberlain; but he had the art of insinuating himself so much into the king's favour, as to be made a confidant, and possessed the place of Gaveston in his heart; and he and his father, whom he made earl of Winchester, had the whole management of affairs in their hands: upon which the barons entered into a confederacy, levied troops, and then so vigorously petitioned for the removal of the Spencers, that the king durst not refuse their demands; and the parliament passed an act for their banishment, which was accordingly put into execution. But now affairs began to be in a flame again, by means of the queen, who having received some affront from the governor of Leeds, which belonged to one of the associated barons, she spurred the king to revenge against the whole body; who having taken the castle of Leeds, hanged the governor, and then turned his arms against the barons. He took Warwick castle, and some others; and then thinking himself strong enough to stand against all opposers, he recalled the two Spencers. Most of the confederate barons threw themselves upon the king's mercy: as to those who stood out, many of them were put to death, some fled the kingdom, and others were imprisoned, among whom was Mortimer, whom the Spencers confined in the Tower. The earl of Lancaster, with what troops he could raise, retired into the north, in order to join the Scots; he was taken and beheaded at Pontefract, 9 lords of his party were executed at York, and others in other parts of the kingdom. The Spencers now exercised their exorbitant power without control; and Mortimer, after having been twice condemned, and twice pardoned by the influence of the queen, made his escape to France, where the queen soon followed, under pretence of bringing about an accommodation between her brother and her husband, but with a full intention to be revenged on the Spencers, who had taken all occasions to mortify her; and afterwards got her son over, to do homage for Guienne and Ponthieu, which she had persuaded his father to resign to him. Edward sent letter after letter, commanding the queen to return with her son; but she always made some excuse or other, all the while plotting to dethrone her husband. All the English who had taken refuge in France, or had been banished, came in to her; among whom was Roger Mortimer, who became her chief counsellor. On Sept. 22, 1326, she embarked with a body of forces, though trusting more to her friends in the kingdom. Accordingly she was no sooner landed, than several lords joined her with a great number of forces; so that the king being deserted by all, concealed himself in the abbey of Neath. He had left Spencer the father in Bristol, which being soon taken, the old man was immediately hung up in his armour, without any formality. The city of London declared for the queen; and the bishop of Exeter, who endeavoured to keep it for the king, was beheaded by the populace. Prince Edward was now declared guardian of the realm; and search being made for the king, he was soon found where he lay concealed, having with him only young Spencer, Chancellor Baldock, Simon de Reading, and a few domestics, every body else having deserted him. With these the unhappy king was conducted to Monmouth castle, and the bishop of Hereford was sent to demand the great seal of him; which he delivered up for the queen and prince, to make use of as they thought proper. The queen, having got the great seal, called a parliament in the imprisoned king's name; but before it met, she caused Spencer to be hanged on a gibbet 50 feet high, and Simon de Reading on one 10 feet lower. The parliament being met, Jan. 1327, unanimously agreed that the king should be deposed, and Edward his son made king in his room. The substance of the charge exhibited against him was, that he had not governed according to the laws of the land; in short, that he was found incorrigible, and without hopes of amendment. Prince Edward was immediately proclaimed king in Westminster Hall, by the name of Edward III. But the generous young prince vowing he would not accept of the crown without his father's consent, it was thought necessary to send commissioners to oblige the king to resign the crown to his son. The king came out in a mourning habit, and fainted away. On his coming to himself, they represented to him the ill consequence that might attend his refusal; upon which he delivered the crown, sceptre, and other ensigns of royalty, into their hands, and made a formal resignation of the regal authority; upon which Sir Thomas Blount, the high constable, broke his staff, and declared all the king's officers discharged. Thus ended the reign of Edward II. Jan. 20, 1327, in the 20th year, and 43d of his age. Besides Edward, who succeeded him, he had another son, called John of Eltham, and two daughters, Joanna, married to David king of Scots, and Eleanor, wife of the Duke of Guelder. Edward is said to have resembled his father in the accomplishments of his person as well as in his countenance; but in other respects he seems to have inherited only the defects of his character; for he was cruel and illiberal, without his valour or capacity. He had levity, indolence, and irresolution, in common with other weak princes; but the distinguishing foible of his character was that unaccountable passion for the reigning favourite, to which he sacrificed every other consideration of policy and convenience, and at last fell a miserable victim. In this reign there was the most terrible earthquake that had ever been felt in England, and a dreadful famine, which lasted three years, and destroyed a vast number of people. During this time, the brewing any sort of beer was prohibited on pain of death, that the corn which used to be consumed that way might be applied to the making of bread. This period is also remarkable for the total suppression of the Knights Templars, not only in England, but all over Christendom; and their estates were assigned to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, now called knights of Malta. This suppression was said to be owing to their enormous vices.

EDWARD III. was proclaimed king on Jan. 20, 1327, and was crowned on the 26th at Westminster, being then in the 14th year of his age. The beginning of his reign gave people room to think they had not changed for the better, which was owing to the bad administration of the queen, who was directed in every thing by Mortimer, who acted more like a sovereign than a subject; and though the parliament had appointed 12 regents during the king's minority, yet Isabella had seized the government into her own hands. King Robert Bruce, thinking to take the advantage of Edward's minority, broke the truce with the English, and sent an army of 20,000 men to ravage the country bordering on Scotland. Edward, exasperated at this, marched an army of 60,000 men, including the Hainaulters, lately brought over; but just as the king was going to head them at York, a quarrel arose between the English and Hainaulters, which came to blows, and a great deal of blood was spilt. This occasioned their stay at York longer than was convenient; and gave the Scots an opportunity of ravaging the country, and posting themselves so that the king could not come to give them battle. The late king was all this time a close prisoner in Kenilworth castle. His harsh treatment began to raise compassion in the people, and Henry of Lancaster entertained some thoughts of setting him at liberty. To prevent this, Lancaster was discharged, and Sir John Maltravers and Sir John Gurney, two men of a brutish disposition, were appointed in his room. They were ordered to remove him from Kenilworth to Berkeley castle, where they received orders to put him to death, which they executed in a barbarous manner: they put a pillow on his face, to keep him from crying out, thrust a pipe up his fundament, that no scar might appear, and through it run a red-hot iron into his bowels; in which exquisite torture he expired, after he had been deposed about eight months. The wretches who perpetrated this horrid murder came to miserable ends; Gurney dying abroad by the hands of the executioner, and Maltravers perishing in exile. His body was buried in a private manner, in the abbey-church at Gloucester, and it was given out that he died a natural death. In 1328, the young king's marriage with Philippa of Hainault was solemnized, and the same year a treaty of peace was made with Scotland; king Edward renouncing all pretensions to that kingdom, and the princess Joanna, his sister, being given to prince David, the king of Scotland's son. Charles, the brother of queen Isabella, dying without male issue, Edward, as the next heir, sent to demand the crown of France; but Philip de Valois, cousin-german to the late king, causing himself to be crowned, Edward was obliged to let the matter lie dormant for the present, and went over to France in 1329, to pay homage for Guienne and Ponthieu, having privately protested beforehand against the homage he was going to pay. Upon his return to England in 1330, the conduct of the queen and Mortimer were represented to him in such a light, that he caused them both to be seized at Nottingham; then calling a parliament, he told them that, with the consent of his subjects, he intended to take upon himself the government, though he was not at the age prescribed by the law; to which the parliament readily assented. The first thing he did was to seize the extravagant dower of the queen, amounting to two-thirds of the revenue of the crown, and then confined her in the castle of Rising for the remainder of her life, which lasted 28 years; and Mortimer was hanged as a traitor, on the common gallows at Tyburn. The same year the king had a son born to him, who was named Edward. The art of weaving woollen cloth was about this time brought from Flanders into England, by John Kempe, to whom king Edward granted his protection, and invited over fullers, dyers, and other artificers belonging to the manufacture, which has since proved so advantageous to England. Edward now intended to break the dishonourable treaty that queen Isabella and Mortimer had drawn him in to make with Scotland. He set Edward Baliol, son of John Baliol, whom Edward I. had made king of Scotland, upon the throne, and young king David was obliged to fly into France; soon after which Baliol was crowned at Scone, and did the same homage to king Edward for Scotland, as his father had done to Edward I. The king of England marched an army to lay siege to Berwick, which was still in king David's hands. The regent of Scotland marched with a great army to its relief, but Edward met him at Halydon-hill, and in a bloody battle, A. D. 1333, entirely routed him; after which Berwick surrendered, which Edward annexed for ever to the crown of England. However, the Scots drove Baliol out of the kingdom; upon which Edward marched with a numerous army in 1335, and attacked Scotland by sea and land; whereupon they submitted. Edward returned to England, leaving the earl of Athol to command in his absence; who, as he was besieging Kildrummy, was attacked, defeated, and slain, by Dunbar and Douglas, who marched to the relief of the place. This occasioned Edward once more to march into Scotland, where he ravaged the counties that had revolted. Then, leaving a small army under Baliol, he came back to England, being now bent upon putting his project against France into execution. He maintained that the Salic Law, in excluding females, did not exclude their male issue; and he was encouraged in his undertaking by Robert d'Artois, whom Philip had disgusted. In 1337 he called a parliament, chiefly to settle the business of the woollen manufacture. He now created his eldest son duke of Cornwall, who was the first in England who had the title of Duke; and ever since the eldest son of the king of England is by birth duke of Cornwall. The first step Edward took was to order the duke of Brabant to demand the crown of France in his name; at the same time making him his lieutenant-general for that kingdom, and commanding the French, whom he styled his subjects, to obey him. In 1339 he set sail with a considerable fleet, and arrived at Antwerp, where he made a long stay, to settle some matters of importance. The first campaign was not opened till Sept. 1339, which ended without bloodshed. The next year Edward took the title of King of France, using it in all public acts, and quartered the arms of France with his own, adding this motto, Dieu et mon Droit, God and my Right. He soon after obtained a great victory over the French at sea; for with a fleet of 300 sail, attacking the French fleet of 400, he took or sunk almost all of them. However, a truce was agreed on, by the mediation of the pope, for three years. Edward also made a truce with David for two years, who was returned into Scotland with troops from France. Whilst these truces subsisted, Edward called a parliament, in which he solemnly confirmed all the liberties contained in the great charter, and created his son Edward, Prince of Wales. In 1346, Edward landed in Normandy, with his son, the prince of Wales, who was now about 16 years of age; and after ravaging the country, encamped at Cressy; and on August 26, 1346, a very obstinate and bloody battle was fought, which proved fatal to the French. The prince of Wales, young as he was, performed wonders. To him the victory was chiefly owing, the king his father leaving him the honour of it. Philip was wounded in the neck and thigh, and being forced to retire, the victory was soon completed. There was slain in this battle, the king of Bohemia, who was blind; the earl of Alençon, Philip's brother; the duke of Lorraine; the earls of Flanders and Blois; 1500 other eminent noblemen, and 120 knights; and above 80 French standards taken. It is said, that in this famous battle the English first made use of cannon, then unknown to the French. After this, Edward besieged Calais, which held out a year; and he at last reduced it by famine, and then consented to a year's truce. During the siege of Calais, the king of Scots advanced as far as Durham at the head of a numerous army; but queen Philippa, marching against him, defeated him, and took him prisoner. King David remained a prisoner eleven years, and then was released upon giving 20 hostages to pay 100,000 marks, at 10,000 a year, till all was paid. A ten years' truce was at this time agreed upon between the two kingdoms. David died in 1368, and left his crown to Robert Stuart his nephew. Not long after the taking of Calais, Edward instituted the most famous order of knighthood in the world, viz. that of the Garter. About the same time, the merchants having complained of the depredations committed by some Spanish ships on the English coast, Edward did not disdain to go in person with some ships, and give chase to these corsairs. He took 26 of their large ships, sunk some, and dispersed the rest. Philip de Valois dying in 1350, left his son his successor, who prolonged the truce to 1354, and then to the year following; but it was ill observed on both sides. When it was near expiring, Edward invested the prince of Wales with the duchy of Guienne, and sent him thither to prosecute the war; who having advanced to the gates of Bourges, upon his return was met by the king of France with an army of 66,000 men, near Poitiers; and here a memorable battle was fought, on September 19, 1356, in which the prince of Wales, notwithstanding the vast superiority of the French, gained a complete victory, and took king John prisoner, with Philip, his fourth son. The duke of Bourbon, the constable of France, the marshal de Nelse, about 50 other great lords, and 800 gentlemen, were slain. A truce for two years was soon after agreed on; and the prince came over to England, bringing the captive king along with him, who was treated with the greatest respect by all the royal family. King John agreed upon a treaty with the king of England, in order to recover his liberty; but the states of France refused to ratify it: upon which Edward, in 1360, went over to France with an army of 100,000 men, with an intent to subdue the kingdom: but he did not carry his point; for though he ravaged the country to the very gates of Paris, yet he could by no means draw the dauphin and the regent out to an engagement; so that his army mouldering away with sickness, and tired with fruitless attempts, he consented to a treaty of peace, which was signed May 8, 1360, whereby the king of France was to pay three millions of crowns of gold for his ransom, and the king of England was to hold Guienne, Calais town, castles, and territories, and several other places; and king John was set at liberty, returned to France, and fulfilled the treaty. In 1363, king John came over to England again, about some matters of importance, and was very honourably received by king Edward. The kings of Scotland and Cyprus being in England at the same time, Sir Henry Picard, citizen and wine merchant of London, entertained the four kings and their retinues with a magnificent feast at his own house. King John died in England, April 8, following. In 1366, pope Urban V. in a haughty manner, demanded the tribute which king John of England obliged himself and his successors to pay to the holy see, of which there were 30 years due. But both king and parliament so vigorously opposed this imposition, declaring king John's engagement to be null, as without consent of parliament, and contrary to his coronation oath, that the pope thought fit to drop it; and neither Edward nor his successors had any more trouble on that head. In 1368, Edward lost his second son, Lionel, duke of Clarence. The year following, Charles V. of France broke the treaty of Bretagne, and declared war against Edward; and the English were so unfortunate as to be deprived of all their late acquisitions in France, except Calais. However, a truce was concluded between the two crowns in 1374. At the beginning of this war queen Philippa died. King Edward, now in his old age, fell in love with Alice Perrers, one of the ladies of the bedchamber to queen Philippa, of whom he was so fond as to squander the public money on her. The parliament obliged him to send her away, but he soon recalled her. On June 8, 1376, died Edward prince of Wales, the delight of the nation, in the 46th year of his age. He was called the Black Prince, from his wearing black armour. The parliament attended his corpse to Canterbury, where he was interred. He had married Joanna, daughter to Edmund earl of Kent, who was beheaded by the intrigues of Isabella and Mortimer, at the beginning of this reign. By her he left one son, Richard, about ten years old, whom the king his grandfather created prince of Wales and earl of Chester, designing him for his successor. King Edward died at Sheen, June 21, 1377, in the 65th year of his age, and 51st of his reign, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. This great prince, when he drew near his end, saw himself deserted by every body. Alice, his favourite, when she saw him dying, seized upon every thing that was valuable, even to the ring on his finger. He had, besides his two sons already mentioned, William, who died an infant; John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster; Edmund, surnamed of Langley, earl of Cambridge, and duke of York; William of Windsor, who died young; and Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester. He had also five daughters. Edward III. was undoubtedly one of the greatest of England's princes, either as a warrior, a law-giver, a monarch, or a man. He possessed the courage and romantic spirit of Alexander; the penetration, the fortitude, the polished manners, of Julius; the magnificence, the liberality, the wisdom, of Augustus Cesar. He was tall, majestic, finely shaped, with a piercing eye, and aquiline visage. He excelled all his contemporaries in feats of arms and personal address; and was courteous, affable, and eloquent. He was a constitutional knight-errant; and his example diffused the spirit of chivalry through the whole nation. In imitation of the youthful monarch, who delighted in tilts and tournaments, every individual betook himself to the exercise of arms, every breast glowed with emulation, every heart panted with the thirst of glory; and when he took the field, there was not a soldier in his army who did not serve from sentiment, and fight for reputation. The love of glory was certainly the predominant passion of Edward, to the gratification of which he did not scruple to sacrifice the feelings of humanity, the lives of his subjects, and the interests of his country; and nothing could have induced or enabled the people to bear the load of taxes with which they were encumbered in this reign, but the love and admiration of his person, the fame of his victories, and the excellent laws and regulations which the parliament enacted with his advice and concurrence. In this reign lived the famous Dr. John Wickliff, the first celebrated English reformer.

EDWARD IV. earl of March, son of Richard duke of York, who was slain in the battle of Wakefield, was about 19 years of age when he was proclaimed king on March 5, 1461, in the room of Henry VI. by virtue of an extraordinary kind of election; for the earl of Warwick having drawn up his troops in St. John's Fields, and caused the people who came out to see them to form a ring, he stood in the middle, and asked them with a loud voice, first, whether they would have Henry of Lancaster for king? They all cried, "No, no." Then he demanded of them, whether they would have Edward, son of the late duke of York, for their king? To which the whole multitude answered with loud acclamations, expressing their assent. This done, he assembled a great council of the nobles and magistrates, in and about London, who declared the crown was devolved on Edward, and accordingly made him an offer of it, which, with a great show of modesty, he accepted. In the beginning of his reign he caused a tradesman of London to be executed, for saying he would make his son heir to the crown; meaning, as he said, his own house, which had that sign. A few days after his proclamation, he put himself at the head of an army of 40,000 men, in order to march against queen Margaret, whose army was increased to 60,000, and gained a complete victory over the queen's army, in a great battle between Caxton and Tewton, in Yorkshire, which was fought on Palm Sunday, and continued from morning to night, in which it is said near 37,000 lost their lives. He then returned to London, where he arrived on June 8, and was crowned the 29th. Shortly after, king Edward called a parliament, which approved of his coronation, confirmed his title, and repealed all the acts which had been made against the house of York. Queen Margaret having received succours from France, entered Northumberland, with Henry and the prince her son, in 1463: but her army was defeated; and Henry, Margaret, and her son, escaped and fled into Scotland. Soon after Edward concluded a truce with France, with the duke of Burgundy, and with Scotland. Henry came privately into England, hoping to conceal himself there, till he should have an opportunity of escaping by sea; but unhappily, being discovered, and seized at Waddington-hall, in Lancashire, whilst he was at dinner, he was, in an ignominious manner, conducted to London, and confined in the Tower. Margaret went over, with the young prince, to René of Anjou, her father. King Edward granted pardon to all Henry's friends, excepting only Ralph Grey and Humphrey Nevil. In 1464 the king fell desperately in love with Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Richard Woodville, and widow of Sir John Grey. He made her his wife, and immediately created Sir Richard Woodville, the queen's father, earl of Rivers, who soon after was made treasurer and high constable of England; and Anthony Woodville, his son, was married to the richest heiress in England. This marriage displeased the nation, particularly the earl of Warwick, who had just concluded a match for the king with the queen of France's sister, and who was resolved to use his utmost efforts to depose him. In 1469 he fomented an insurrection in Yorkshire, and the malecontents met the earl of Pembroke with the king's forces, near Banbury, in Oxfordshire, where a battle was fought, in which Pembroke was defeated, and being taken, was beheaded by the rebels, with Sir Richard Herbert his brother. In Northamptonshire the rebels went in a tumultuous manner to a mansion house of the earl of Rivers, the queen's father, seized him, and beheaded him at Northampton. The king, no way suspecting Warwick, granted him and his brother a commission to raise troops; which they did, and declared for the rebels. The king hereupon marched against them in person; and whilst a negociation was on foot, in order to an accommodation, the earl of Warwick attacked the king's camp in the night, put them in the utmost confusion, and took the king prisoner, who was conducted to Middleham castle, in Yorkshire: this was in 1470. Edward found means to make his escape, by bribing his guard, and went to London; and now both sides prepared for war. Sir Robert Wells went to raise forces in Lincolnshire, and was met by the king at Stamford, who routed his whole army, and Wells himself was taken and beheaded. Warwick and Clarence retired into France, to concert new measures. Lewis having furnished the earl of Warwick with money and troops, he set sail with the duke of Clarence, landed at Dartmouth, and his army was soon increased to 60,000. He forthwith proclaimed Henry VI. and marched in pursuit of Edward, who fled, and took refuge in Holland; and then, in Oct. 1470, the earl of Warwick released king Henry out of the Tower, after a six years' imprisonment, who was solemnly proclaimed on the 14th, as again ascending the throne. A parliament was now called, which met on November 20, and voted Edward a traitor and usurper, confiscated all his estates, annulled all the acts made in his reign, and declared all those to be rebels who had borne arms in defence of Edward's pretended right. The duke of Burgundy, to whom Edward had fled for protection, having furnished him with some money, ships, and men, he landed at Ravenspur, in Yorkshire, 1471; and, having gained over the duke of Clarence, marched to London, and entered the city amidst the acclamations of the people. Henry, after a seven months' phantom of sovereignty, was sent again to the Tower. On April 14, a fierce battle was fought between the king and the earl of Warwick at Barnet, which began early in the morning, and continued till noon; but Warwick's army being overpowered, was put to the rout, great numbers being slain on the spot, with the earl himself, and the marquis of Montague, his brother. Queen Margaret, who, with prince Edward her son, was just arrived from France, was very much shocked with the news; and, abandoning herself to grief and despair, took sanctuary at the abbey of Beaulieu, in Hampshire. But the duke of Somerset, the earl of Pembroke, and the other lords, persuading her to try her fortune once more, by putting the prince of Wales, her son, at the head of an army, she consented, and those lords, in a very short time, got together a great number of troops. The king marched against them; and, coming up with them at Tewkesbury, where they entrenched themselves, eight days after the battle of Barnet, entered their camp, and entirely routed them with a terrible slaughter. The queen, the prince of Wales, and the duke of Somerset, were taken: the last was beheaded; the prince, then 18 years old, was stabbed to death in cold blood; and queen Margaret was imprisoned in the Tower, where she remained till 1475, and was ransomed by Lewis XI. for 50,000 crowns. As to Henry VI. he was murdered in the Tower, in the 50th year of his age. The king, not content with the severity he had exercised against the Lancastrian party, completed the tragedy in 1478, by the death of his own brother, the duke of Clarence; being instigated thereto by the queen, the duke of Gloucester, and the rest of Clarence's enemies. And now Edward gave himself up to his pleasures, in which he was extravagantly profuse, which put him upon extorting money from his subjects by very cruel methods. He was seized with a violent fever, which carried him off on April 9, 1483, in the 42d year of his age, and 23d of his reign. He had a great many mistresses, among whom was Jane Shore, wife to a citizen of London. By his queen Elizabeth he had Edward prince of Wales, who succeeded him; Richard, duke of York; Elizabeth, who was married to king Henry VII.; Cicely, married to lord Wells; Anne, married to Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk; Bridget, who was a nun; Mary, who died unmarried; and Catharine, whose husband was William Courtney, lord of Devonshire. Edward was a prince of the most elegant person and insinuating address; endowed with the utmost fortitude and intrepidity; possessed of uncommon sagacity and penetration; but, like all his ancestors, was brutally cruel and vindictive, perfidious, lewd, perjured, and rapacious, without one liberal thought, without one sentiment of humanity.

EDWARD V. then about 12 years old, was proclaimed immediately after the death of his father, though he was never crowned; being deposed by his uncle Richard duke of Gloucester, who got himself to be proclaimed king, June 20, 1483, and afterwards procured the murder of his nephews, Edward V. and Richard duke of York, by two ruffians, who rushing into their chamber in the Tower, stifled them in their beds, and then buried them under the staircase. This, sir James Tyrrel, whom Richard had made governor of the Tower for this purpose, confessed at his execution in the next reign. However, as it was an opinion implicitly received, that the bodies had been removed, by Richard's orders, to consecrated ground, their bones lay undiscovered till the reign of Charles II. by whose orders they were put into a marble urn, and deposited among the monuments of the royal family, in the chapel of Henry VII. with a Latin monumental inscription on it, of which the following is a translation: "Here lie the remains of Edward V. king of England, and of Richard duke of York. These unhappy brothers, who were shut up in the Tower, and there smothered with pillows, by order of their perfidious uncle, Richard, the usurper of the throne, were privately and indecently buried. Their much-desired bones, diligently and often sought for in vain, (July 17, 1674, one hundred and ninety-one years after their death,) were dug up in the ruins of a staircase, which formerly led to the chapel of the White Tower, and known by most undoubted tokens. The most compassionate king Charles II.

pitied their severe fate, thought fit to order these most unfortunate princes this place among the monuments of their forefathers; in the year of our Lord 1678, and the 30th of his reign." Edward V. reigned 2 months and 12 days.

EDWARD VI. the only son of Henry VIII. by his queen Jane Seymour, succeeded his father at the age of nine years and three months, and was a prince of excellent qualities. He was proclaimed January 31, 1547, by the name of Edward VI. and was crowned Feb. 20. The late king had appointed a regency during his minority, which was fixed to his 18th year. The regency being met, thought proper to choose a president, with the title of Protector of the Realm, and Governor to the King, who was to do nothing without the consent of the majority. The choice fell upon the earl of Hertford, the king's uncle, who was afterwards made duke of Somerset. In this reign many learned reformers took refuge in England, on whom king Edward bestowed pensions. In 1553, the young king fell into a consumption, and died July 6, being in the 16th year of his age, having reigned six years, five months, and nine days. He was a prince of fine accomplishments. He kept a journal, which is preserved in the British Museum, in which he regularly entered all the important transactions of his reign. He was remarkably pious, and continued firmly attached to those principles of the Reformation which he had imbibed while young, and which made a great progress in his reign. He confirmed his father's grants of Christ's and St. Bartholomew's hospitals, and founded Bridewell and St. Thomas's hospitals. He also founded several schools, which were mostly endowed out of the church lands. Edward is celebrated by historians for the beauty of his person, the sweetness of his disposition, and the extent of his knowledge. By the time he had attained his 16th year he understood the Greek, Latin, French, Italian, and Spanish languages; he was versed in the sciences of logic, music, natural philosophy, and master of all the theological disputes; insomuch that the famous Hieronymus Cardamus, in his return from Scotland, visiting the English court, was astonished at the progress he had made in learning, and afterwards extolled him in his works as a prodigy of nature. Notwithstanding these encomiums, he seems to have had an ingredient of bigotry in his disposition, which would have rendered him very troublesome to those of tender consciences, who might have happened to differ from him on religious principles: nor can we reconcile either to his boasted humanity or penetration, his consenting to the death of his uncle, who had served him faithfully, unless we suppose he wanted resolution to withstand the importunities of his minister, and was deficient in that vigour of mind, which often exists independent of learning and culture.

EDWY succeeded Edred in 958, and was no sooner on the throne than he commanded Dunstan, who had been treasurer to the late king, to give an account of the money entrusted to him. Dunstan refused to obey, alleging the money had been expended for pious uses. The king's council were not for pushing this affair any farther, for fear of the people, who had a high notion of Dunstan's sanctity, and an extravagant veneration for the monks and their religious houses; so that they branded every one who spoke against them as impious and profane. However, to mortify the abbot, the monks were turned out of the benefices they had invaded, and the secular priests restored. Upon this the monks vented the most bitter invectives imaginable. Dunstan, who was supposed to be the chief author of these clamours, was banished, or, as some say, voluntarily retired to a monastery in Flanders. And now the monks with all their might cried down the government of the young king, and represented him as the most impious of men. This soon occasioned an insurrection in Mercia; and Edgar, the king's brother, headed the revolvers; and, having secured that part of the country, he marched into Northumberland and East Anglia, where the Danes (always glad of a disturbance among the English) joined them. Edwy was unprepared to quell this rebellion, not imagining it was in the power of the monks to do so much mischief, and knowing that neither the people nor his brother had any just cause of complaint. Such, however, was the event, that he could only keep Wessex, which preserved its fidelity to him, and was forced to deliver up all the rest, of which Edgar was at length chosen the head, with the title of king of Mercia. Edwy did not long survive this partition; for being vexed at being deprived of his dominions, and that the monks had thus got the better of him, he fell into a deep melancholy, which put an end to his life, after he had reigned a little above four years. He was buried at Winchester.

EDYSTONE, or Eddystone Rocks, in the English Channel, so called from the great variety of contrary sets of the tide or current which prevail near them. They are situated nearly S. S. W. from the middle of Plymouth Sound, distant from the port about 14 miles. As they lie nearly in the direction of vessels coasting up and down the Channel, they were very dangerous, and ships were sometimes wrecked on them, before the lighthouse was established here. They are so exposed to the swells of the ocean, from all the southwestern points of the compass, that the heavy seas break on them with inconceivable fury. Sometimes, after a storm, when the sea is to all appearance perfectly smooth, the under current meeting the slope of the rocks, the sea beats upon them in a terrific and magnificent manner, and even rises above the light-house, overtopping it, for the instant, with a canopy of frothy wave. The present lighthouse is nearly 80 feet high, and has withstood the most violent storms, without sustaining the smallest injury. It was completed by Mr. Smeaton in 1774. The building, to the height of 33 feet from the foundation, is a solid mass of stones, ingrafted into each other; above this are four rooms, one over the other, and at the top a gallery and lantern. Its distance from the Ram Head, the nearest point of land, is 12 miles. Lon. 4. 24. W. lat. 50. 8. N.

To EEK, v. a. [eacan, Sax.] to make bigger by the addition of another piece; to supply any deficiency, sometimes including the idea of botching; used with the particle out.

EEL, s. [æl, Sax.] in Natural History, a fish of the serpentine kind, which lives in muddy places.

EFFABLE, a. [effabilis, Lat.] expressive; utterable; that may be spoken.

To EFFACE, v. a. [effacer, Fr.] to destroy any painting; to spoil the form of any piece of carving; to blot out; to destroy all marks or traces of a thing from the mind.

EFFE'CT, s. [effectus, Lat.] that which is produced by an operative cause; a consequence; advantage; profit or service. In the plural, goods, furniture, or moveables.

To EFFE'CT, v. a. [efficio, Lat.] to bring to pass; to attempt with success; to produce as a cause, or by the application of power; to achieve; to accomplish.

EFFE'CTIBLE, a. that may be produced, done, or performed; practicable; feasible.

EFFECTIVE, a. having the power to produce an effect; proper for action; efficacious; effectual; operative; active.

EFFECTIVELY, ad. with power; powerfully; really; entirely; efficiently; actively; efficaciously; effectually.

EFFECTLESS, a. without effect; without causing any change or alteration by the application of power; without producing any effect; impotent; useless; unmeaning.

EFFE'CTOR, s. [Lat.] one who produces any effect; one who is the cause of a thing; a maker; a creator.

EFFE'CTUAL, a. [effectuel, Fr.] producing the object, end, or design for which it is intended; powerful; operative; efficacious. SYNON. With respect to these two words, that of efficacious seems not so powerful as that of effectual. The first gets the better of most obstacles; the last, of all. By an efficacious remedy we put an effectual stop.

EFFE'CTUALLY, ad. in such a manner as to produce the end for which it is applied; effectually; actively.

To EFFE'CTUATE, v. a. [effectuer, Fr.] to bring to pass; to accomplish; to fulfil; to achieve.

EFFE'MINACY, s. the acting like a woman; softness; unmanly delicacy; or want of those qualities which distinguish and become a man. Lasciviousness.

EFFE'MINATE, a. [effeminatus, Lat.] void of the qualities which distinguish and adorn the male sex; acting or behaving like a woman; voluptuous, or luxurious.

To EFFE'MINATE, v. a. [effemino, Lat.] to make womanish; to emasculate; to weaken. Neuterly, to grow womanish.

EFFE'MINATELY, ad. in an effeminate manner; voluptuously. Weakly; softly. By womanish arts.

EFFEMINATION, s. the quality or cause of rendering a person womanish; the state of one emasculated.

To EFFERVE'SCE, ef-fer-vess, v. a. [effervesco, Lat.] to grow warm, to produce heat by fermentation, or the motion of the particles of a body among themselves.

EFFERVE'SCENCE, s. [from efferveo, Lat.] the production of heat by intestine motion. Among Chemists, it is that intestine motion, excited in various fluids, either by the mixture of fluids with others of a different nature, or by dropping salts or powders of various kinds into fluids.

EFFETE, a. [effatus, Lat.] barren; worn out with age.

EFFICA'CIOUS, a. [efficax, Lat.] producing the effect or end intended; powerful to produce consequences.

EFFICA'CIOUSLY, ad. in such a manner as to produce the effect or end intended; effectually; powerfully.

EFFICACY, s. [from efficax, Lat.] the power of producing the end or effect intended; production of intended consequences. Applied to speech, persuasion.

EFFI'CIENCE, or EFFI'CIENCY, s. [from efficio, Lat.] the act of producing effects in things or persons; agency.

EFFI'CIENT, s. [from efficiens, Lat.] a cause; one that makes or causes things to be what they are; one who effects.

EFFI'CIENT, a. [efficiens, Lat.] having the power to produce or cause alteration or change in things, either by altering the qualities, or introducing new ones; causing effects.

To EFFI'GIATE, v. a. [effigio, Lat.] to form in semblance; to image.

EFFIGY, s. [effigies, Lat.] the resemblance or representation of any thing drawn, painted, or carved. An idea, applied to the mind.

EFFINGHAM, a village in Surrey, 12 miles N. E. of Guildford. It was once, according to tradition, a populous town, containing 16 churches. There are proofs of its having been a much larger place; for wells, and cavities like cellars, have been frequently found in the neighbouring fields and woods; and in the church are some ancient stalls and monuments.

EFFLORE'SCENCE, or EFFLORE'SCENCY, s. [from effloresco, Lat.] in Botany, a production of flowers. In Natural History, an excrescence in form of flowers. In Medicine, a breaking out of some humours, &c. in the skin; as in the measles, and the like.

EFFLORE'SCENT, a. [efflorescens, Lat.] shooting out in the shape of flowers. In Medicine, appearing in pimples, or other eruptions on the skin.

EFFLU'ENCE, s. [from effluo, Lat.] that which flows from some other principle.

EFFLU'VIA, or EFFLU'VIUM, s. [from effluo, Lat.] the small particles continually emitted by, or flowing from, a body, which though they do not sensibly decrease the body itself, have perceptible effects on the senses.

EFFLUX, s. [effluxus, Lat.] the act of flowing out; effusion; spreading; or the visible effect of some cause; that which flows from something else; an emanation.

To EFFLUX, v. a. [effluo, Lat.] to flow from; to move in succession.

EFFLU'XION, s. [effluxum, Lat.] that which flows out; effluvium; emanation. The action of flowing out.

To EFFOR'CE, v. a. [efforcer, Fr.] to force; to break through by violence; to violate by force; to strain.

EFFORM'ATION, s. [from efformo, Lat.] the act of giving form to, or making.

EFFORT, s. [effort, Fr.] a struggle; a laborious or vehement exertion of power; a strain.

EFFO'SSION, s. [from effodio, Lat.] the act of digging from the ground; deterration.

EFFRO'NTERY, s. [effronterie, Fr.] an immodest and undaunted boldness, by which a person is capable of undertaking any action, including the idea of impudence and daring. Shamelessness; contempt of reproach.

To EFFUL'GE, v. n. [effulgeo, Lat.] to send forth lustre or effulgence.

EFFUL'GENCE, s. [from effulgeo, Lat.] splendour, or a glorious degree of light; lustre; brightness; clarity.

EFFUL'GENT, a. [effulgens, Lat.] shining with a superlative degree of light or splendour; luminous; bright.

EFFUMAB'ILITY, s. [from fumus, Lat.] the quality of flying away, or vapouring in fumes.

To EFFU'SE, v. a. [from effusus, Lat.] to pour out; to spill; to shed.

EGBERT, king of Wessex, became monarch of England by the conquest of the other kingdoms, in the year 827 or 828. Before the reduction of the heptarchy, he subdued the Britons in Cornwall, and also those of Vendosia, which was one of the three kingdoms into which Wales was divided. After he was crowned king of England, (being the first) he reigned in peace for some time. In 833, the Danes arrived at Charmouth, in Dorsetshire, with 35 vessels, and, meeting with no opposition, furiously ravaged the country. Egbert marched against them, and was entirely defeated, after a long and bloody battle; and Egbert himself narrowly escaped, by the favour of a dark night. In 835, another body of Danish pirates landed near Hengston-hill, in Cornwall, over whom Egbert gained an entire victory. Egbert reigned in all 37 years as king of Wessex only; 7 years as monarch, or chief of the seven kingdoms; and 10 years as real monarch, or king of all England. He died in 838, and was buried at Winchester.

To EGEST, v. a. [egero, Lat.] to throw out food at the natural vents.

EGESTION, s. [egestus, Lat.] the act of throwing out digested food at the natural vents.

EGRETTE, s. [Fr.] an ornament of ribbons, worn by ladies on the front of their hair.

E'GYPT, a country of Africa, about 500 miles in length, and from 160 to 250 in breadth. It is bounded on the S. by Nubia; on the W. by the Deserts of Barca, Fezzan, &c. on the N. by the Mediterranean; and on the E. by the Red Sea and the Isthmus of Suez. This country, so famous in history, seems not to have an extent proportionable to the pompous description which the ancients have given of its having contained 20,000 towns, or cities, and several millions of inhabitants, and of its ancient kings keeping armies of 300,000 men, and executing those prodigious works, the pyramids, the labyrinth, the immense grottos of Thebais; the obelisks, temples, and pompous palaces; the Lake Moëris, and the vast canals, &c.; but when we consider the amazing fertility of the soil, enriched, as it has always been, by the overflowing of the Nile, and its high state of cultivation, these accounts seem more probable. Egypt has been ever noted for its plenty of corn; and when the dearth was in all lands, in the days of Jacob, in the land of Egypt there was bread; and all countries came thither to buy corn. Except in our winter months, the heat is oppressive to all who are not accustomed to it, and they are generally visited by the plague about once in seven years. The winds are sometimes of such extreme heat and aridity, that their influence proves mortal. During the time they last, the streets are deserted, and the inhabitants are almost blinded by drifts of sand, which are so subtle, that they insinuate themselves into the closets and cabinets. No country in the world is better furnished with corn, rice, flesh, fish, sugar, fruits, and vegetables, than Egypt. It is divided into the Upper, Middle, and Lower; the last comprehends the Delta, which produces oranges, lemons, figs, dates, almonds, cassia, and plantains, in great plenty. The animals found in Egypt are hyenas, antelopes, apes with the head like a dog's, camels, black cattle, fine horses, and large asses, crocodiles, the cameleon, the ichneumon; ostriches, eagles, hawks, pelicans, and water-fowl of various kinds. The ibis, which resembles a duck, and was deified by the ancient Egyptians, on account of its destroying serpents and noxious insects, is not now found here. They have a serpent here, called the cerastes, or horned viper, the bite of which is mortal to those who have not the secret of guarding against it. The practice of charming, alluded to in Psalm lviii. 4, 5. Eccles. x. 11. and Jerem. viii. 17. appears still to prevail here; for some of the natives can play with the cerastes, which to them is perfectly harmless, but when applied to a hen, or any other animal, it bites and instantly kills it. Since Egypt has been under the dominion of the Turks, it has been governed by a bashaw, who resides at Cairo. Under him are inferior governors in the several parts of the country. Those in Upper Egypt are generally Arabs, who pay tribute to the Grand Signor, and make presents to the bashaw, governing despotically, and making war with each other; besides these there are sheiks, who preside over particular places, and are masters of a few villages. The present population of Egypt is computed at 2,500,000. The inhabitants are composed of four different races of people; the Turks, the Arabs, the Cophts, who are descended from the first Egyptians, which became Christians; and the Mamlouks, who were originally Circassian and Mingrelian slaves, but being the only military force, were the real masters of the country, till 1811, when the race was nearly extirpated by assassination, by the contrivance of the pashaw. The governors of the country are Mohammedans; but the Cophts, Greeks, and Latins, are Christians of different sects; and in the great towns are numbers of Jews. A considerable trade was carried on here in East-India commodities, till the Portuguese found the way to Asia round the Cape of Good Hope. However, the merchants visit the harbours in the Mediterranean, and import and export several sorts of merchandise; and, from other parts, the natives get elephants' teeth, gold dust, musk, civet, ambergris, and coffee. The gold dust is brought from Negroland to Fez and Morocco, and thence to Cairo, in caravans, over immense deserts. The commodities which the merchants purchase here are coffee, senna, cassia, rhubarb, sal ammoniac, myrrh, saffron, salt-petre, aloes, opium, indigo, sugar, sandal-wood, dates, cotton cloth, &c. The largest of the pyramids takes up eleven acres of ground; and is, as well as the others, built upon a rock. The external part is chiefly of large square stones, of unequal sizes, and its perpendicular height is 461 feet. In their vicinity, are catacombs, wherein are mummies, or embalmed dead bodies, which are three or four thousand years old. The complexion of the Egyptians is tawny, and the farther south the darker, insomuch that those on the confines of Nubia are almost black. They are mostly an indolent people, especially the richer sort, who spend much of the day in drinking coffee, smoking tobacco, and sleeping; and these are said to be ignorant, proud, and ridiculously vain. M. Denon says, "The houses of Upper Egypt are vast dove-cots, in which the owner reserves only a chamber for himself, and there he lodges with the hens, chickens, &c. exposed to all the devouring insects which beset those animals. To catch these insects occupies his day; and the texture of his skin braves their bite at night." In 1798, the French, with an army of 40,000 men, under Bonaparte, took possession of this country, after a feeble resistance from the natives; but, on the 8th of March, 1801, a British army effected a landing, and after some sharp conflicts, (especially the battle of the 21st of March, in which the brave Abercrombie was mortally wounded,) succeeded in bringing the French, under general Menou, to capitulate for the evacuation of the country, and the Turks have ever since kept an army here. Cairo is the capital.

ELDER-DOWN, s. the down of the Gothland duck, called eider, which is remarkably fine, and in such high esteem for its warmth when used in the lining of certain apparel, as to be sold at a very high price.

ELD, s. [eald, Sax.] old age; decrepitude.

ELDER, [the comparative of eld, now corrupted to old] a. one who surpasses another in years; one who is born before, or who survives, another.

ELDER, s. [ellasa, Sax.] in Botany, the name of a tree. The inner bark is by some esteemed good for dropsies; the leaves are outwardly used for the piles and inflammations, and form an ointment. The flowers are inwardly used to expel wind; and, when made into an ointment, used outwardly as a cooler. The berries are esteemed cordial, and useful in hysteric disorders.

ELDERLY, a. bearing the marks of old age; advanced in years, yet short of positive old age.

ELDERS, s. (plural) persons whose age gives them a claim to honour and respect; those who are born before others; ancestors. Among the Jews, the rulers of the people; answering to the word senator among the Romans. In the New Testament, such of the clergy as had some authority in the church on account of their years.

ELDERSHIP, s. a claim founded on being born before another; seniority; primogeniture. A presbytery.

ELDEST, a. [the superlative of old, which is compared thus, old, elder, eldest] exceeding others in years; born before others; the oldest; having right of primogeniture.

ELECAMPANE, s. a plant which Botanists rank among the star-worts. It is reckoned a stomachic, alexipharmic, and sudorific; and therefore prescribed in crudities of the stomach, the cough, asthma, plague, and other contagious diseases. Externally, it is recommended against the itch, convulsions, and rheumatism.

To ELE'CT, v. a. [from electus, Lat.] to choose a person for the discharge of some post or office; to take in preference to others. In Divinity, applied by some divines to signify choice made of some persons by the Deity as objects of his favour and mercy.

ELE'CT, a. [electus, Lat.] chosen; taken by preference from other things proposed as objects of choice; chosen to supply an office or place, but not yet in possession.

ELE'CTION, s. [electio, Lat.] the act of choosing a person from other competitors, to discharge any office or employ; choice. Figuratively, the power of choosing; the privilege of electing a person to discharge an employ; the ceremony of a public choosing of a person to discharge an employ.

ELE'CTIVE, a. exerting the power of choice; regulated, bestowed, or conferred, by free choice, or votes.

E'LEMENTARY, a. uncompound; simple; without mixture; having for essence only one principle or element.

E'LEMI, s. a drug, improperly called gum Elemi, being a resin. The genuine Elemi is brought from Ethiopia, and is very rare in Europe. The spurious, or American Elemi, almost the only kind known, proceeds from a tall tree.

ELENCH, s. [elenchus, Lat.] an argument; a sophism.

ELEPHANT, s. [elephas, Lat.] the largest of all quadrupeds, of whose sagacity, faithfulness, prudence, and even understanding, many surprising relations are given. This animal feeds on hay, herbs, and all sorts of pulse; is naturally gentle; and said to be very long-lived. He is supplied with a trunk, or long hollow cartilage, which proceeds from his nose, and serves him for hands. His tusks are the ivory so well known in Europe.

ELEPHANTA, or Gali Pouri, a small island on the W. coast of Hindoostan, about 5 miles E. of Bombay, and inhabited by about 100 poor Indian families. It contains one of the most stupendous antiquities in the world. A colossal figure of an elephant, cut coarsely in black stone, but cracked and decayed, appears in an open plain, on the landing-place, near the foot of a hill, from which an easy slope leads to an immense subterranean temple, excavated in the solid rock, 80 feet long, and 40 broad. The roof, which is cut flat, is supported by regular rows of pillars, about 18 feet high, with capitals resembling round cushions. The sides, formed into compartments, contain a great variety of carved figures; but that at the end of the temple, opposite to the entrance, is the most remarkable: it includes, with many subordinate figures, a gigantic Trimurti, or three-formed deity. The figures and pillars have been defaced and mutilated by visitors, particularly by the absurd zeal of the Portuguese, when this island was in their possession. In 1814, the head and neck of the elephant dropped off; and the body has since sunk, and threatens to fall. Mr. Grose judges this immense excavation to be a bolder work than that of the pyramids of Egypt; and Major Rennel thinks this, and a subterranean temple in the adjacent isle of Salsette, to be monuments of a superstition anterior to that of the Hindoos. This island now belongs to the English.

ELEPHANTIASIS, s. [Lat.] in Medicine, a species of leprosy, so called from its covering the skin with incrustations, like those on the hide of an elephant.

ELEPHANTINE, a. [elephantinus, Lat.] pertaining to an elephant; partaking of the qualities of an elephant. Likewise a title given to certain books among the Romans, which contained an account of the actions of the emperors, and the laws made by the senate; supposed to be so called from their vast size, or their being composed of ivory.

To ELEVATE, v. a. [elevo, Lat.] to raise aloft, on high, or at a distance from the ground; to exalt or dignify; to raise the mind with great and sublime ideas; to elate.

ELEVATE, part. or a. raised or situated on high.

ELEVATION, s. [elevatio, Lat.] the act of raising on high. Exaltation, applied to dignity or preferment. The raising the thoughts to contemplate lofty and sublime subjects. In Astronomy and Geography, the height of any object above the horizon. In Architecture, a draught of the principal side or face of a building, called its upright. In Perspective, a draught or representation of the whole body of a building. In Gunnery, the angle which the chase of a piece of ordnance, or the axis of its hollow cylinder, makes with the plane of the horizon.

ELEVATOR, s. [Lat.] a raiser or lifter up.

ELFIN, a. relating to fairies; belonging to elves.

ELFLOCK, s. knots of hair supposed to be twisted by elves.

ELGIN, formerly Moray, or Murray, the county-town of Elgin or Murrayshire, in Scotland. Here are many large old buildings, erected over piazzas, and the ruins of its old cathedral shew it to have been once a magnificent structure. The population is about 5000; and it sends one member to parliament, in conjunction with Banff, &c. It is situated near the river Lossie, 5 miles from the mouth of Murray Frith, and 163 N. of Edinburgh.

ELGINSHIRE. See MURRAYSHIRE.

ELHAM, a small town in Kent, with a market on Monday, situated on the Lesser Stour, 10 miles S. of Canterbury, and 67 E. S. E. of London.

To ELICIT, v. a. [elicio, Lat.] to strike, find out, or discover by dint of labour and art.

ELICIT, a. [elicitus, Lat.] brought from a state of bare possibility to that of real existence; brought into action.

ELIGIBLE, a. [eligibilis, Lat.] fit to be chosen; worthy of choice; preferable; possessing all those qualities and excellencies which are sufficient to set a thing above others, and recommend it.

ELIGIBLENESS, s. worthiness to be chosen; preferableness.

ELIMINATION, s. [eliminatio, Lat.] banishment; rejection; the act of banishing or turning out of doors.

ELISION, s. [elisio, Lat.] in Grammar, the cutting off a vowel or syllable in a word, as in "th' attempt," where e is cut off, because coming before a vowel. This is called synalæpha, frequently practised in English poetry, and always observed in Latin verse. A division, cutting, dividing, attenuating, or a separation of parts.

ELIXATION, s. [from elixus, Lat.] in Pharmacy, the extracting the virtues of ingredients by boiling or stewing.

ELIXIR, s. [Arab.] a medicine made by strong infusion, where the ingredients are almost dissolved in the menstruum, and give it a thicker consistence than a tincture. The extract or quintessence of any thing; any cordial or invigorating fluid or substance.

ELIZABETH, daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, ascended the throne Nov. 17, 1558, being then 25 years old, pursuant to the order of succession settled by that king's will, authorised by act of parliament, and was crowned January 15, 1559. As there were many troubles then in foreign states, chiefly on account of religion, she assisted the protestants in Scotland, France, and the Low Countries, against their respective sovereigns, or the governing party, by whom they were cruelly oppressed and persecuted. The queen of Scots, and the dauphin her husband, had, by order of Henry II. of France, taken the arms of England, with the titles of sovereigns of that kingdom: this made Elizabeth look on Mary as a dangerous rival; whereupon she entered, 1560, into a treaty with the Scotch malecontents, in pursuance of which she sent an army into Scotland to break the measures of her enemies, which had the desired success. Some time after she assisted the Hugonots in France. By these means queen Elizabeth kept both France and Scotland so employed, that they could find no opportunity to put their schemes in execution of de-throning her. The pope was desirous of sending a nuncio to England, who was arrived in Flanders, and demanded permission to continue his journey to England, but could never obtain it; the queen saying she had nothing to do with the pope, who had no more authority than other bishops; and, as a security against the disturbance the pope might cause to be given from any quarter, she always kept a good fleet in readiness against any invasion, and secured more and more the affections of her subjects, which she looked upon as her only support. The queen of Scots, being defeated in 1568 by the forces raised by the malecontents in that kingdom, was obliged to fly into England, where the queen kept her prisoner many years. The persecution of the protestants in the Low Countries occasioning several Flemish families to fly for refuge to England, the queen settled them at Norwich, Colchester, Sandwich, and several other places, which turned greatly to the advantage of the nation, they being the first who brought hither the art of making bays and says, and other linen and woollen cloths of the like sort. A rebellion broke out in the North, under the earl of Westmoreland and Northumberland, and Dacres, a northern gentleman, who intended to have set Mary Queen of Scots on the throne, and to have restored the popish religion. This rebellion queen Elizabeth suppressed, and the earl of Northumberland was beheaded; as was also the duke of Norfolk in 1572, who had been released out of the Tower, and engaged again in a conspiracy against the queen. The year 1571 passed chiefly in a negociation for a marriage between queen Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou, second son to Catharine de Medicis, and brother to Charles IX. of France. Both Charles and Elizabeth found their account in this negociation, though neither of them intended it should take effect. Charles's design was to amuse the protestants, particularly the Hugonots, with whom he had made a perfidious peace, till he had drawn them into the snare, in order to destroy them by treachery, when he found it difficult to do it by open force. Queen Elizabeth entered into the negociation of the match to please her ministers, who were continually pressing her to marry, in order to cut off all hopes from the queen of Scots, and to dishearten her enemies. However, a defensive alliance was concluded between the two crowns. Charles died, and was succeeded by the duke of Anjou, by the name of Henry III. with whom queen Elizabeth renewed the league between the two crowns, but under-hand supplied the prince of Condé with money for the Hugonots; so that she might justly be called the support of the protestant religion both abroad and at home, having in the beginning of her reign removed all the zealous catholics from the councils, and from all posts of authority, put protestants in their room, and published a proclamation allowing divine service to be performed, and the holy Scriptures to be read, in the vulgar tongue. Some time after, another negociation was carried on for a marriage between her and the duke of Alençon, now duke of Anjou, Henry's brother, even to the signing of the marriage articles, and the duke came over in person; but it was all broke off on a sudden. One Stubbs had his right hand cut off on a scaffold for writing against the marriage; when he pulled off his hat with his left, and cried, God save the queen! In 1577 she assisted the people of the Low Countries, who were grievously oppressed by the duke of Alva, the king of Spain's general, and who was endeavouring to extirpate the protestants; she lent them 100,000*l.* sterling to enable them to carry on the war. Some years after she sent a good body of forces under the earl of Leicester; but he, not being agreeable to the States, was recalled, and lord Willoughby was appointed general of the English forces in his room. This war at last concluded in the total revolt of seven of these provinces from the dominion of Spain, which since made the most considerable republic in the world. The pope excommunicated the queen; and the king of Spain and the duke of Guise were in a league with the pope to invade England, dethrone Elizabeth, and set up the queen of Scots in her room. In the mean time, several plots were set on foot by the popish emissaries to take away her life; for which several priests, Jesuits, and others, were executed. A general association was also formed in England to prosecute to death such as should attempt any thing against her person or government. The parliament approved and confirmed this association, and passed a severe act against popish priests and Jesuits, whereby they were required to depart the kingdom, and, if any returned, they were to be guilty of high-treason, and those who harboured them, of felony. A little after the queen made an alliance with the king of Scotland for their mutual defence, and the security of the protestant religion. In 1585, she sent sir Francis Drake to America, who took several places in the Spanish West Indies. This year died the learned and ingenious sir Philip Sidney, of a wound he received in a battle in the Low Countries. In 1586, Babington's conspiracy, in which were engaged several popish priests from the seminaries abroad, was discovered; and they were, to the number of 14, arraigned, condemned, and executed. It was laid for an invasion, to kill the queen, free the queen of Scots, and set her on the throne. As the queen of Scots appeared by letters and otherwise to have a hand in this conspiracy, it was resolved now to prosecute her on an act of parliament made the preceding year, whereby the person for whom, or by whom, any thing should be attempted against the queen, was liable to death. Commissioners were accordingly sent to try her at Fotheringham Castle in Northamptonshire, where she was then in custody, who in the end passed sentence upon her on the 25th of Oct. Four days after it was approved and confirmed by parliament. On Dec. 6th, it was proclaimed in London, and then throughout the kingdom; and in February following the sentence was executed in the hall of the said castle, by severing her head from her body, which she suffered with great calmness and resignation. Queen Elizabeth endeavoured by all methods to prevent the odium of this action falling upon her, fining secretary Davyson, with whom the warrant was lodged, 10,000*l.* (and he was also imprisoned during her pleasure,) and ordering her privy-counsellors to be examined in the star-chamber. In 1588, the king of Spain, encouraged by pope Sixtus V. sent a great fleet, to which they had given the title of the Invincible Armada, to invade England. It consisted of 130 great ships, 20 caravels, and 10 salves, having above 20,000 soldiers on board, with seamen, ammunition, and provision, in proportion; to oppose which, 20,000 men were dispersed along the southern coasts, an army of 22,000 foot and 1000 horse was encamped at Tilbury, where the queen reviewed them, and made a very engaging speech to them; there was another army of 34,000 foot and 2000 horse, to guard the queen's person. Her subjects shewed the utmost readiness to stand in her defence; and she fitted out a considerable fleet, under the command of lord Howard as admiral; Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher, vice admirals; and sent Seymour with 40 English and Dutch ships to the coast of Flanders, to hinder the prince of Parma from joining the Spanish fleet. On the 19th of July, the Spanish fleet, commanded by the duke of Medina Celi, entered the Channel, when the English fleet kept close to them, and soon took some of their ships. On July 24th, there was a brisk engagement. On the 27th, the Spanish fleet came to an anchor off Calais, expecting in vain the prince of Parma to put to sea with his army, and make a descent on England, as it had been agreed. The English fleet, now consisting of 140 ships, several of which were fitted out by private persons, followed them; and the English admiral in the night sent 8 fire-ships among them, which so terrified them that they cut their cables, and put to sea in the utmost confusion; the English admiral took the Galleas, and the commander of it was slain. In short, the whole fleet was dispersed, and the Spaniards resolved to make the best of their way home. Of this prodigious armament only 60 ships returned home, and those in a shattered condition. Queen Elizabeth went in state to St. Paul's, to return Almighty God thanks for this great victory. In 1590, sir Francis Walsingham, secretary of state, departed this life; he died so poor, that he was buried privately to save expense. Sir Robert Cecil, son to the lord treasurer Burleigh, succeeded him as secretary of state. In 1594, Rodrigo Lopez, a Jew, who was the queen's physician, two Portuguese, and Patrick Cullen, an Irishman, were bribed by the Spanish governors of the Netherlands to take her away by poison, or otherwise; but the plot being discovered, the conspirators were seized and executed; as were Edmund York and Richard Williams, the next year, for undertaking to commit the same crime, on the promise of 40,000 crowns from the said Spanish governors. In 1596, the queen sent a fleet and army, under Howard, the earl of Essex, and Raleigh, to the coast of Spain, which plundered Cadiz, and burnt the merchant ships at Port Real, and took and destroyed 13 Spanish men of war, and did them other considerable damage. In 1598, Henry IV. of France, having made a separate peace with the king of Spain, queen Elizabeth and the States entered into a new treaty to carry on the war against that monarch by themselves. Lord Burleigh died this year, as did Spenser the poet. On Feb. 25, 1601, Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, was beheaded. Towards the end of the year, complaints having been brought before the commons of certain monopolies authorized by letters patent, as soon as the queen understood that the parliament deemed them so many infringements of the people's privileges, without staying to be addressed, she annulled most of them, and left the rest to the laws, upon which the commons waited upon her with an address of thanks. This year the earl of Tyrone, who had raised a rebellion in Ireland, was defeated, and obliged to cast himself upon the queen's mercy. In the beginning of the year 1603, queen Elizabeth falling sick, and her illness increasing every day; when she was near her end, the council sent some of their body to desire her to name her successor: when she named the king of Scots. She died the 24th of March, in the 70th year of her age, after a reign of 44 years, 4 months, and 8 days. She was buried in Westminster-abbey. Elizabeth in her person was masculine, tall, straight, and strong-limbed, with a high round forehead, brown eyes, fair complexion, fine white teeth, and yellow hair. She danced with great agility; her voice was strong and shrill; she understood music, and played upon several instruments. She possessed an excellent memory, understood the dead and living languages, had made good proficiency in the sciences, and was well read in history. Her conversation was sprightly and agreeable, her judgment solid, her apprehension acute, her application indefatigable, and her courage invincible. She was the great bulwark of the protestant religion; she was highly commendable for her general regard to the impartial administration of justice, and even for her rigid economy, which saved the public money, and evinced that love for her people which she so warmly professed; yet she deviated from justice in some instances, when her interests or passions were concerned; and, notwithstanding all her great qualities, she was vain, capricious, proud, imperious, and in some cases cruel. Her predominant passions were jealousy and avarice; though she was also subject to such violent gusts of anger, as overwhelmed all regard to the dignity of her station, and even hurried her beyond the bounds of common decency. She was wise and steady in her principles of government; and, above all princes, fortunate in a ministry. She established the protestant religion in her dominions, notwithstanding all the endeavours used to prevent it; and caused trade and commerce, which always met with her protection, to flourish. The Royal Exchange was built in her time by Sir Thomas Gresham; and the present method of maintaining the poor, and choosing overseers in every parish, was established in her reign.

ENGLAND, [so called from the Angles, who settled here in the year 449, and came from the continent, where they had dwelt between the Saxons and Jutes] the southern, and most considerable part of the island of Great Britain, bounded on the N. by Scotland; on the E. and N. E. by the German Ocean; on the S. by the British Channel; and on the W. by the principality of Wales, and the Irish Sea. It lies between 2 degrees E. and 6 W. longitude, and between 50 and 56 N. latitude; and is of a triangular form. From the Land's End in Cornwall to Berwick upon Tweed, it is about 425 miles; from Berwick to the S. Foreland in Kent, its length is about 345 miles; and thence to the Land's End, its greatest breadth is 340. The country exhibits a variety of prospects, varying from the extensive plain, and gently-rising uplands, with the intervening vales, and gently-flowing rivers, to the lofty mountains, craggy hills, deep dells, and tumbling torrents. Though in some parts there are large barren moors, and wide uncultivated heaths, on the whole, few countries have a larger proportion of land under cultivation, and there is none where it is more necessary for the subsistence of the inhabitants. All the valuable productions, both animal and vegetable, of this country, have been imported at different periods from the continent; and have been kept up and improved by constant attention. Overrun with woods, like the wilds of America, nuts, acorns, crabs, and a few wild berries, formed the only vegetable food which this country formerly afforded. The bear, the wolf, and the wild boar, now totally extirpated, roamed at large in the forests, large herds of stags ranged through the woods, roebucks bounded over the hills, and wild bulls ranged in the marshy pastures. By degrees the woods were destroyed, the marshes drained, and the wild animals, invaded in their retreats, gradually disappeared, and their places were supplied by the domestic kinds. England now possesses no other wild quadrupeds than some of the smaller kinds, such as the fox, the wild cat, the badger, the marten, and others of the weasel kind; the otter, the hedge-hog, the hare, and rabbit; the squirrel, dormouse, mole, and several species of the rat and mouse. There are dogs of every kind, except wolf-dogs, which, since the wolves were destroyed in England, have been generally neglected; however, the race of these animals is still maintained in Ireland. But there is one sort that is not to be equalled in any part of the world, which is, the bull dog; for these will not only attack the fiercest bull, but any kind of wild beast; nor can any thing, when they have once fastened upon the animal, oblige them to let go their hold. But what is more strange, when any of them are transported beyond sea, they lose their courage; and the same is said of English cocks. It must, however, be confessed, that the use which is made of the courage of these creatures, (especially the latter,) by men too from whose rank and talents better things might be expected, deservedly fix a stigma on the national character. On the other hand, the various kinds of domestic animals, imported from abroad, have been reared to the greatest perfection; and the improvements in the vegetable products of this island have been no less considerable. It must be acknowledged there are no vines that are so fit to produce good wine, as in warmer countries; but then there are variety enough which yield good grapes, that are made use of as other fruits. However, there are great quantities of cider, perry, mead, and several kinds of made wines; but the principal drink of the generality is beer or ale. The rigours of winter, as well as the parching heats of summer, are felt here in a much less degree than in parallel climates on the continent, as the breezes from the sea temper the severities of the opposite seasons; but the changes of weather are generally more frequent and sudden, while few countries are clothed with so beautiful and lasting a verdure. Its situation, however, so far north, is less favourable to the ripening than to the growth of vegetable productions. The winters indeed are sometimes rainy and foggy, and the weather is subject to great variations, which, however, does not much impair the health of the inhabitants who are accustomed thereto; for they generally live as long as in any other countries, and we have frequent instances of people who have lived to a very great age, particularly Henry Jenkins, a Yorkshireman, who was 168 years old when he died; and Thomas Parr, of Shropshire, who was 152, and might have lived longer, had he not been sent for to court as a curiosity. The harvests, especially in the northern parts, often suffer from the rains, and the fruits fall short of perfect maturity. The richest parts of the land are, in general, the middle and southern; extensive tracts in the northern parts are rather sterile, and on the eastern coasts, in many parts, the ground is sandy and marshy. In the north the country is mountainous, and Cornwall and the adjacent counties contain many rough hilly tracts; but in these parts, a variety of rich and valuable minerals and metals are found. Considered as a corn country, the east coast, from its superior dryness, is favourable to the growth of grain; and the west coast, from the wetness of the climate, is better calculated for pasturage. The most considerable rivers are the Thames, Severn, Medway, Trent, Ouse, Tyne, Tees, Wear, Mersey, Dee, Avon, Eden, Derwent, &c. The lakes are chiefly in the N. W. counties; and those of Westmoreland and Cumberland, in particular, exhibit varieties of romantic, picturesque, and grand scenery. The river fish, from the populousness of the country, and the number of fisheries, are, in many parts, much diminished; but the sea is an inexhaustible source of wealth, and the coasts are enlivened by numerous inhabitants, who gain their chief subsistence from the deep. The manufactures and commerce of this country are prodigious, and absorb almost the whole attention of many classes of the people. The government is a mixture of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy: the legislative power residing in the king, the house of lords, and the house of commons; but the executive power is vested solely in the king, who appoints the great officers of state, the judges, and many even of the inferior gradations of magistracy. The national church establishment is episcopal; the 39 articles are interpreted by the clergy, in general, according to the liberal principles of Arminius, although the 17th article strongly favours the Calvinistic creed. The dissenters are numerous, and of different descriptions; most of the rigorous penal laws, which were long in force against them, having been repealed. England contains 32,094,400 acres, or 50,210 square miles, with a population, in 1821, independent of the army and navy, of 11,260,555; being an increase, from 1811 to 1821, of 1,721,728, or 18 per cent.

ENGLAND, NEW, a country of North America, bounded on the W. by New York; on the N. by Canada; on the E. by Brunswick and the Atlantic Ocean; and on the S. by the same ocean and Long Island Sound. It is in many parts hilly; but the country is, notwithstanding, fertile, well cultivated, and populous. It was first settled by the Puritans, who were driven from England, at different times, by persecution; and contains five states, namely, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Vermont. The Connecticut, Merrimack, Penobscot, and Piscataway, are the principal rivers.

E'PHESUS, anciently a celebrated city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, and the capital of the Roman dominions in Asia. Here was the famous temple of Diana, which the ancient Christians afterwards converted into a place of public worship; but it is now so entirely ruined, that it is difficult to find the ground plot; however, there are some ruins of the walls, and five or six marble columns, all of a piece, 40 feet in length, and 7 in diameter. It is now called Ajasalouc, and has still some magnificent and curious remains of its former splendour. The fortress seems to be the work of the Greek emperors. The only inhabitants are a few Greek families, who have reared huts among the ruins, to shelter themselves from the weather, and who are so illiterate, as to be unable to read, in its original language, the Epistle of Paul to their ancestors, the Ephesians. It is seated at the mouth of the Caystrus, and has still a good harbour, 30 miles nearly S. of Smyrna. Lat. 37. 52. N. lon. 27. 42. E.

E'PHOD, s. [Heb.] an ornament, or kind of girdle, worn by the Jewish priests, when they attended at the temple; it was brought from behind the neck over the two shoulders; and then hanging down before, was crossed over the stomach, and thence carried round the waist twice, like a girdle, having its two ends brought before, which hung down to the ground. That of the high priest was embroidered with blue, purple, crimson, twisted cotton, and gold. Upon that part which came over the two shoulders were two large precious stones, on each of which were engraven the names of six tribes; where it crossed the priest's breast was a square ornament, called the breast-plate, set with twelve precious stones, on each of which was engraven the name of a different tribe. That of the other priests consisted of linen only.

ESSEX, a county of England, bounded on the W. by Middlesex and Herts; on the N. by part of Cambridgeshire and the river Stour, which separates it from Suffolk; on the E. by the German Ocean; and on the S. by the Thames, which divides it from Kent. It is about 54 miles long from E. to W. and 48 broad from N. to S. and is divided in 20 hundreds, which contain 27 market-towns, 406 parishes, 976,000 acres, and 289,424 inhabitants. It has no considerable hills, but exhibits a variety of soil and face of country, generally fertile. Its S. W. part is occupied principally by the forests of Epping and Hainault, and is noted for its butter. The N. W. part, from Saffron Waldon to Cambridge, is famous for the growth of saffron. The middle part is a fine corn country, varied with gentle inequalities of surface, and sprinkled with woods. What are called the hundreds of Essex, (though included in the hundreds of Barnstable, Rochford, and Dengy) bordering on the Thames and the sea, consist chiefly of marshy grounds, which afford excellent pasturage, yet are deemed unwholesome; but more inland they are dry, elevated, and healthy; and even the worst parts of them have been rendered much healthier than formerly, by clearing the woods and draining the stagnant waters. Great numbers of calves are sent from hence to the London market, with other cattle; also fowls, wild and tame, and the oysters, known by the name of Colchester oysters. The principal rivers, besides the Thames, are the Stour, which falls into the German Ocean at Harwich; the Lea, Chelmer, Blackwater, Coln, Crouch, and Roding. Chelmsford is the county-town; but Colchester is the largest.

To ETERNIZE, v. a. [éterniser, Fr.] to render perpetual or endless; to render immortal; to immortalize.

ETHELBALD, had reigned two years as king of Wessex during his father's life, continued to possess that throne after his decease, and reigned but about two years and a half after his father's death: no remarkable event happened in his reign. He is handed down to us as a luxurious, debauched prince. He died in 860.

ETHELBERT, already in possession of the kingdom of Kent, succeeded to the whole monarchy, according to Ethelwulf's will. His reign of about six years is remarkable for nothing but the incursions of the Danes. He died in 866; and was buried at Sherborn.

ETHELRED I. succeeded Ethelbert in the kingdom of Kent, 866. In this reign the Danes became masters of Northumberland and East-Anglia, and resolved to push their conquests further, hoping in the end to subdue all England. With this view, Ivar, king of Denmark, turned his arms against Wessex, and resolved to attack Ethelred; he landed his troops in that county, and advanced as far as Reading. Ethelred marched that way with his army; a war hereupon ensued, and Ethelred, within the space of one year, fought nine pitched battles with the Danes, in some of which he was victorious, in others not, but in all gave signal proofs of his courage and conduct; but unhappily in the last, which was fought near Whittingham, he received a mortal wound, of which he died, in 872, in the 6th year of his reign. Ethelred has the character of a good prince.

ETHELRED II. succeeded Edward the Younger in 979; he was then about 12 years of age. In 981 the piratical Danes landed at Southampton; and, in short, for ten years together, with now and then a little intermission, there was nothing to be seen but plunderings, conflagrations, murders, and all the miseries imaginable. During this time the credit of the monks went down apace; the people began to wonder, that they, who could do so many miracles (as they pretended) on their own account, could not, by their merits and prayers, prevent the calamities of the nation. Ethelred shewed them no manner of respect. In 990, Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, died. The Danes continually ravaged the kingdom, and Ethelred always bought them off when his forces had been defeated. The last money he paid them was 30,000*l.* which was levied by way of a tax called Danegeld, and was the first land-tax in England. Upon this the Danes ceased their ravages, and most of them returned home; but as a great many of them, liking the country, staid behind, and England was well stocked with them before, they began now to take upon themselves to domineer over the English, who were perpetually in dread of new invasions. They lived in ease and pleasure, while the English were forced to labour and toil to satisfy their demands. Hence they gave them the name of Lord Danes; and to this day, in some parts of England, a rich, idle, imperious man is called in derision a Lurdane. Ethelred, having married Emma, sister to the duke of Normandy, and depending on his assistance when required, resolved on a general massacre of the Danes. He privately sent orders to all parts of the kingdom for this purpose, which were executed with such fury, that in one day, viz. Nov. 13, 1002, all the Danes were slain; though some think, that by all the Danes are meant only those lately settled in England, and dispersed in Wessex and Mercia. King Sweyn's sister, who was a Christian, and married to a noble Dane, who had been settled some time in England, fell among the rest. Ethelred was so cruel as to have her beheaded, after he had ordered her children to be killed before her face. Sweyn, king of Denmark, no sooner heard of this bloody tragedy, and the cruel murder of his sister, but he swore he would never rest till he had revenged so monstrous an outrage. He therefore equipped a fleet of 300 sail, and came not for plunder as before, but to destroy the country with fire and sword. He landed in Cornwall with a powerful army, marched to Exeter, and having put the inhabitants to the sword, reduced it to ashes. Ethelred, who was betrayed on all hands, imprudently trusted the command of the army to the duke of Mercia, whom he had formerly banished, and whose son's eyes he had ordered to be put out; and he, in revenge, betrayed it to the Danes, as soon as he came in sight of them. The following spring Sweyn landed, and burnt Norwich and Thetford: soon after he engaged Ulfkettle, duke of East-Anglia, the bravest of all Ethelred's subjects, and entirely defeated him. In 1005 there was a famine in England, which obliged the Danes to return home for want of subsistence; but they returned again. In short, the Danes, in 1013, made themselves masters of the whole kingdom, and Ethelred returned into Normandy with his whole family. Sweyn being now proclaimed king of England without any opposition, he laid a most heavy tax on the nation, for paying the Danish troops. He died suddenly in 1014. Upon Sweyn's death, the Danes proclaimed his son Canute king of England; but the English recalled Ethelred, and flocked to him from all parts, so that he soon found himself at the head of a numerous army. Canute on a sudden embarked his troops, to assert his right to that crown. In the mean time Ethelred governed as bad as ever. Canute having settled affairs in Denmark, returned in about a year, and landed with a numerous army at Sandwich. Edmund, the king's eldest son, and his brother-in-law Edric, commanded the army against him; but Edric, in a little time, openly declared for Canute, and carried off with him a considerable body of troops, and 40 ships; after which Canute became master of several counties in Wessex, and Edmund marched into the north to join Uthred, earl of Northumberland. Canute followed him; and upon his coming, Uthred submitted to him; but Canute, thinking him not to be trusted who changed sides by compulsion, caused him to be put to death. Ethelred died in 1016, in the 50th year of his age, after a most inglorious reign of 37 years.

ETHELSTAN, or Athelstan, succeeded Edward the elder, being his natural son, in 925; but the illegitimacy of his birth was not then deemed a sufficient obstacle to his inheriting the crown. However, Alfred, a nobleman of his kindred, is said to have entered into a conspiracy against him, in favour of the legitimate sons of the deceased king, who were yet too young to be capable of governing themselves; which he effectually crushed. This monarch received also some disturbance from the Northumbrian Danes, whom he compelled to surrender; and resenting the conduct of Constantine, king of Scotland, who had given them assistance, he ravaged that country with impunity, till at length he was appeased by the humble submissions of that monarch. These submissions, however, being extorted, were insincere. Soon after Ethelstan had evacuated that kingdom, Constantine entered into a confederacy with a body of Danish pirates and some Welsh princes, who were jealous of Ethelstan's growing greatness. A bloody battle was fought near Brunzburg, in Northumberland, in which the English monarch was again victorious. After this success Ethelstan enjoyed his crown in tranquillity, and he is regarded as one of the ablest and most active of the Saxon kings. During his reign, the Bible was translated into the Saxon language; and some alliances also were formed by him with the princes on the continent. In his reign he enacted a law, that a merchant who had made three long voyages on his own account, should be admitted to the rank ofthane, or gentleman. He died at Gloucester, in 941, after a reign of sixteen years, and was succeeded by his brother Edmund.

ETHELWULPH, Egbert's only surviving son, succeeded his father in 838. In 840 a body of Danes landed on the coast of Wessex. Ethelwulph, notwithstanding he was averse to fighting, marched against them in person, but was defeated. About this time the nation of the Picts, so formidable heretofore to the southern Britons, were entirely extirpated by their neighbours the Scots, after a long war between them. Ethelwulph, wearied with the repeated incursions of the Danes, delivered up to Ethelstan, his natural son, Kent, Essex, and Sussex, with the title of king of Kent, contenting himself with the kingdom of Wessex, and the sovereignty of all England. In 852 the Danes came up the Thames, with a fleet of 300 ships, and pillaged London and other places; but Ethelwulph and Ethelstan engaged them near Oakley, in Surrey, in which the English gained the day, and made such a terrible slaughter of the Danes, that but few escaped. The victory of Oakley having delivered him from the fear of the Danes, he now had an opportunity of indulging his natural bent to devotion; and by the advice of Swithin, bishop of Winchester, who had always a great ascendancy over him, he is said to have granted to the church, the tithes of all his dominions. In 855 he paid a visit to the pope in person, to receive his benediction; and extended the tax of Peter-pence all over his dominions, till then levied only in Wessex and Mercia. Having staid a year at Rome, he returned home through France, where he married Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald, not above 12 years old. Whilst Ethelwulph was at Rome, Ethelbald entered into a conspiracy to dethrone his father, and to seize the kingdom; and made so great a party, that Ethelwulph was obliged to give up to him the kingdom of Wessex, and to rest contented with that of Kent for himself: Ethelwulph lived but about two years after this. He died in 857, after a reign of 20 years, and was buried at Winchester. He left by will his dominions to his second son Ethelbert, after him to his third son Ethelred, and then to Alfred his youngest, who all in their turn succeeded to the crown.

EUPHRATES, one of the most celebrated rivers in the world, and the principal of Asiatic Turkey. It has one source about a day's journey, and another two days' journey, from Erzerum, in Armenia. The plain of Erzerum is enclosed between these two fine streams, which, when united, form what is called the Euphrates, or the Phrat. After their junction, about three days' journey from Erzerum, the united stream begins to be navigable for boats; but the channel is so rocky, that the navigation is not safe. In its course it separates Aladulia and Syria from Diabeker, and Diabeker from Arabia, after which it runs through the Irak-Arabi, till it receives the Tigris, and falls into the Persian Gulf about 35 miles below Bussorah.

EURO'CLYDON, s. [εὐροκλύδων, Gr.] a wind which blows between the east and north in the Mediterranean, and is very dangerous. It is of the nature of a whirlwind, which when it falls suddenly on ships, causes them sometimes to founder.

EUROPE, the least of the four general parts or quarters of the world, is bounded on the W. by the Atlantic, on the N. by the Frozen Ocean, on the E. by Asia, and on the S. by the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. It is about 3400 miles in length, and about 2300 in breadth, and is situated between 10 deg. W. and 60 E. lon. and between 36 and 72 deg. N. lat. As it nearly all lies within the temperate zone, it has neither the excessive heat, nor the insupportable cold, of the other parts of the world. Though it does not afford the richest productions of the earth, nor abound in costly mines, it is generally much more populous and better cultivated, in proportion to its extent, than the other quarters of the globe. The wild animals are but few, except in the woods, rocks, and mountains of the north, and of the Alps; but the domesticated are very numerous. The chief mountains are the Alps, Apenines, and Pyrenées. The principal rivers are the Danube, Dniester, Dnieper, Vistula, Volga, Dwina, Bog, Oby, Don, Scheldt, Rhine, Rhône, Seine, Loire, Garonne, Groyne, Tajo or Tagus, Thames, and Severn. The principal lakes are those of Constance, Geneva, Lausanne, Wenner, Ladoga, and Onega. Europe contains the countries of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, United Netherlands, Great Britain, Ireland, France, Germany, Poland, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Hungary, Switzerland, and part of Russia and Turkey, besides some islands in the Mediterranean and elsewhere. There are three empires, namely, those of Russia, Turkey, and Austria. The kingdoms are those of Great Britain and Ireland, France, Spain, Portugal, Poland, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, Hanover, Würtemberg, Bavaria, Saxony, United Netherlands, Bohemia, Hungary, Naples, or the Two Sicilies, and Sardinia. There are likewise the ecclesiastical state of Rome, or of the Pope, and numerous principalities, dukedoms, and other minor states. The languages are the Latin, of which the Italian, French, and Spanish, are dialects; the Teutonic, from which proceed those of Germany, Flanders, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and England; the Sclavonian, which reigns (though in disguise) in Poland, Muscovy, Bohemia, and a great part of Turkey in Europe; the Celtic, of which there are dialects in Wales, the Highlands of Scotland, Ireland, Bretagne in France, and Lapland. Besides these, there are the Greek, and several others. The prevailing religious profession is the Christian, divided into the Greek, Romish, and Protestant churches. Mohammedism is the established faith of the Turks; and numberless Jews are dispersed in the different countries.

EURYTHMY, s. [εὐρυθμος, Gr.] harmony of verse or pronunciation; regular and symmetrical measure.

EUSTA'TIA, ST. one of the least of the Caribbee Leeward Islands, in the West Indies, about 10 miles N. W. of St. Christopher's. It is properly a mountain, in the form of a sugar-loaf; or it may be termed, a huge pyramidal rock, whose top is hollow or concave, and serves as a large den for wild animals. It is strong by situation, having but one landing-place, which is difficult of access, and fortified with all the art imaginable, by its masters the Dutch. Tobacco is its chief production. Not less than 5000 white inhabitants, and about 15,000 negroes, subsist upon this island, and rear hogs, kids, rabbits, and poultry, in such abundance, that they can afford to supply their neighbours, after having served themselves. In general, it serves as a storehouse for all kinds of European commodities. It was taken by the British in 1781, and again in 1810, but restored to the Dutch at the peace. Lat. 17. 31. N. lon. 63. 5. W.

EUTE'RPE, one of the nine Muses, to whom the invention of the Mathematics, and playing on the pipe, is ascribed.

EUTHANA'SY, s. [εὐθανασία, Gr.] easy death.

EUTY'CHIANS, in Church History, heretics in the fifth century, who embraced the errors of the monk Eutyches, maintaining that there was only one nature in Jesus Christ. The divine nature, according to them, had so entirely swallowed up the human, that the latter could not be distinguished; insomuch that Jesus Christ was merely God, and had nothing of humanity but the appearance.

EVULGATION, s. [evulgo, Lat.] the act of divulging; publication; disclosure.

EVULSION, s. [evulsio, Lat.] the act of plucking off.

EXCHE'QUER, s. [eschequeir, Norman Fr.] in the British Jurisprudence, an ancient court of record, in which all causes concerning the revenues and rights of the crown are heard and determined, and where the revenues are received. It took its name from the cloth which covered the tables of the court, which was party-coloured or chequered. This court is said to have been erected by William the Conqueror, its model being taken from a like court established in Normandy long before that time. Anciently its authority was so great, that it was held in the king's palace, and the acts thereof were not to be examined or controlled in any other of the king's courts; but at present it is the least of the four courts of Westminster.

EXCISE, s. [accijs, Belg.] a certain duty or impost charged upon liquors, as beer, ale, cider, &c. also on several other commodities, within the kingdom of Great Britain; and is one of the most considerable branches of the king's revenue. In England, the commissioners are nine, each of whom has a salary of 1000*l.* per annum. This duty was first granted to king Charles II. in 1660, for his life, in England and Wales, and has been continued in several parliaments since, and extended to Scotland.

To EXCISE, v. a. to levy a tax on a person or thing.

To EXCOMMUNICATE, v. a. [excommunico, low Lat.] to exclude or debar a person from partaking of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

EXCOMMUNICATION, s. [excommunicatio, Lat.] an ecclesiastical penalty or censure, whereby persons who are guilty of any notorious crime or offence are separated from the communion of the church, and deprived of all spiritual advantages. In the ancient Christian church, the power of Excommunication was lodged in the hands of the clergy, who distinguished it into the greater and less. The less consisted in excluding persons from the participation of the eucharist, and the prayers of the faithful; but they were not expelled the church. The greater Excommunication consisted in absolute and entire exclusion from the church, and the participation of all its rights; notice of which was given by circular letters to the most eminent churches all over the world, that they might all confirm this act of discipline, by refusing to admit the delinquent to their communion. The consequences were very terrible. The person so excommunicated was avoided in all civil commerce and outward conversation. No one was to receive him into his house, nor eat at the same table with him; and when dead, he was denied the solemn rites of burial. The papal Excommunications have been famous, or rather infamous, throughout the world; but at present they are formidable to none but a few petty states of Italy. Excommunication disables a person from doing any judicial act, as suing in an action at law, being a witness, &c.

To EXCORIATE, v. a. [excorio, Lat.] to flay, or strip off the skin.

F.

F is the sixth letter of the alphabet, and fourth consonant, by some reckoned mute, and by others a semi-vowel; its sound in English is invariable, (except in the preposition of, where it is pronounced like v) formed by a compression of the whole lips and a forcible breath; it has much the same sound as the Greek ϕ , or ph in English words; and therefore, in all words derived from the Greek, it should be written with ph, and in those of the Latin original with an f. Suetonius says, that the emperor Claudius invented the f, and two other letters; and that it had the force of v consonant, and was written inverted thus, ɹ . Most writers, however, derive it from the Æolians, among whom it was called digamma, from its being composed of two gammas, placed one upon the other; which shape was preserved in later times in the Lombardic F. As a numeral, F denotes 40, and with a dash over it thus, $\overline{F}$, 40,000. In Music, it stands for the bass clef; and frequently for forte, as ff does for forte, forte. In Medical Prescriptions, f stands for fiat, let it be done; thus F. S. A. stand for fiat secundum artem, let it be done according to art. As an abbreviation, F stands for Fellow, as F. R. S. for Fellow of the Royal Society.

FAIRSPOKEN, a. civil and complaisant in expressions.

FAIRY, s. [ferhth, Sax.] a kind of spirit, supposed to appear in a diminutive form, and to dance in meadows, and reward cleanliness in houses; an elf; a fay. An enchantress. Fairy Circle, or Ring, a phenomenon frequently seen on hills and downs, and supposed by the vulgar to be traced by the Fairies in their dances. There are two kinds of it; one of about seven yards in diameter, containing a round bare path, a foot broad, with green grass in the middle. The other is of different sizes, and encompassed with a circle of grass, greener and fresher than in the middle. Jessop and Walker, in the Philosophical Transactions, ascribe them to lightning; which is confirmed by their being most frequently produced after storms of that kind, as well as by the colour and brittleness of the grass roots, when first observed.

FAIRY, a. belonging to, or given by, fairies.

FAIRYSTONE, s. a stone found in gravel pits.

FAISANS, or Pheasants, a small island in the river

Bidassoa, between France and Spain, about two miles from Fontarabia. The peace of the Pyrenées was concluded here in 1669, when the kings of France and Spain had an interview, on the marriage of Louis XIV.

FAITH, s. [fides, Lat.] in Mythology, a deity of the Romans, which had a temple in the Capitol. In Divinity and Philosophy, a firm belief of certain truths, upon the testimony of the person who reveals them. The grounds of a rational faith are, 1. That the things revealed be not contrary to, though they may be above, natural reason; 2. That the revealer be well acquainted with the things he reveals; 3. That he be above all suspicion of using deception. Figuratively, belief of the truth of revealed religion; the system of revealed truth held by Christians; trust or confidence in God; trust in the honesty or veracity of another. Fidelity, or unshaken adherence to a promise; sincerity.

FERMANA'GH, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, 38 miles in length, and about 23 in breadth, containing 18 parishes, and 130,399 inhabitants, is bounded on the W. by Leitrim and Donegal; on the N. by Donegal and Tyrone; on the E. by Tyrone and Monaghan; and on the S. by Cavan and Leitrim. It is navigable throughout its whole length, by means of the lakes of Lough Erne. The linen manufacture, and the raising of cattle and hemp form the chief trade of this county; though there is only one linen market in it. Enniskillen is the capital.

To FERMENT, v. a. [fermento, Lat.] to exalt or rarefy, by intestine commotion.

FERMENT, s. [fermentum, Lat.] that which causes intestine motion. A commotion, or tumult, applied to government.

FERMENTABLE, a. capable of having its parts put into an intestine commotion; susceptible of fermentation.

FERMENTAL, a. having the power of raising an intestine commotion. Not used.

FERMENTATION, s. [fermentatio, Lat.] a slow motion of the intestine particles of a mixed body, arising usually from the operation of some active acid matter, which rarefies, exalts, and subtilizes the soft and sulphureous particles, as when leaven or yeast rarefies, lightens, and ferments bread or wort. And this motion differs much from that usually called ebullition or effervescence, which is a violent boiling and struggling between an acid and an alkali, when mixed together.

FERMENTATIVE, a. causing, or having the power to cause, an intestine commotion of the particles.

FERN, s. [fearn, Sax.] in Botany, a plant growing on the stumps of trees in woods, and on the banks of ditches. Decoctions of the root are used as diet drinks in chronical cases; and country people esteem it a sovereign remedy in the rickets.

FERNY, a. overgrown with fern.

FERO'CIOUS, a. [féroce, Fr.] wild, untamed, fierce; savage; resembling a savage. Rapacious; ravenous.

FEROCITY, s. [ferocitas, Lat.] fierceness; savageness.

FEROE, Faro, Farol, or Faroer Islands, a cluster of 22 small islands in the Northern Ocean, subject to Denmark, of which 17 only are habitable. Each of these is a lofty mountain, rising out of the waves, divided from the others by deep and rapid currents. Some are deeply indented with secure harbours; all are steep, and most of them exhibit tremendous precipices. The soil is shallow, but remarkably fertile; barley, the only corn grown here, yields above 20 for 1; and the grass affords abundant pasturage for sheep; but no trees above the size of a juniper or stunted willow are to be seen here. Vast quantities of sea-fowl frequent the rocks, the taking of which furnishes a perilous employ for the inhabitants. The exports are salted mutton, tallow, goose-quills, feathers, eider down, knit woollen waistcoats, caps, and stockings. Lat. between 61. 15. and 62. 10. N. lon. between 5. and 7. 26. W. The chief island is Stromoe.

FERRARA, a district of Italy, bounded on the N. by Polesino di Rovigno; on the W. by the Mantuan; on the S. by the Bolognese and Romagna; and on the E. by the Gulf of Venice. It had its own dukes till 1597, when Pope Clement VIII. united it to the States of the Church. Though formerly one of the finest countries in Italy, it is now almost uncultivated. The air is unwholesome on account of the marshes. The city of Ferrara is the seat of an university, and an archbishop's see, and has a number of fine buildings, which evince its former opulence; but the inhabitants, who are very few in proportion to the extent of the place, bear every mark of poverty. It is seated on a branch of the Pô, 25 miles N. E. of Bologna.

FERREOUS, a. [ferreus, Lat.] of the nature of iron.

FERRET, s. [fured, Brit.] in Natural History, a small animal, somewhat resembling a rat, with red eyes, and a long snout, used to catch rabbits or rats. A kind of narrow ribband, or tape, made of wool or silk.

FERRETER, s. one who hunts another, and discovers him in his hiding-places.

FERRIAGE, s. the sum paid for a passage at a ferry.

FERRO, or Hiero, the most westerly of the Canary Islands, remarkable for affording no water, except what can be collected in cisterns and reservoirs during the rainy season. Though not very fertile, the inhabitants raise corn, sugar, fruit, and legumes, and feed a great number of cattle. Voyagers speak of a fountain-tree, in the middle of the island, which, during the night, distils water from its leaves. The western extremity of Ferro was formerly accounted the place of the first meridian; but national partialities have induced the moderns to reckon the longitude from the capital of their own particular countries; according to the English computation, it lies in long. 17. 52. W. lat. 27. 47. N.

FERROL, a strong fortified town of Spain, in Galicia, with one of the best harbours in Europe, where vessels lie secure from all winds. It is a marine arsenal, and the principal station for the Spanish navy. The town is surrounded on three sides by the sea, and strongly fortified on the other. It is seated on a bay of the Atlantic Ocean, 20 miles N. E. of Corunna. Lat. 43. 28. N. lon. 8. 4. W.

FEUD, s. [fæth, Sax.] quarrel; strife; opposition; war.

FEUDAL, a. [feudalis, low Lat.] pertaining to fees, feus, or tenures, by which lands are held of a superior lord. Feudal Tenure, an estate in land, given by the lord to his vassals in lieu of wages, upon condition of their assisting the lord in his wars, or doing him some other service. At first, the feudal estates were held absolutely at the will of the lord, but afterwards they were made hereditary; and duchies, earldoms, baronies, &c. were granted absolutely upon the condition of fealty and homage. The vassal was obliged to appear in the field upon his lord's summons, to follow his standard, to protect his person, and never to desert him, upon the score of danger, and to pay aids and taxes; upon non-performance of which, the estate was forfeited. About the year 990, Hugh Capet made these estates hereditary, and the French nobility began to take their surnames from their principal manors. William the Conqueror is said to have introduced these tenures into England. The granting these fees was anciently very solemn. In the empire, those that were considerable were granted by delivering a standard or banner; but the French passed them by delivering a ring and a staff.

FEUDATORY, s. [feudatoire, Fr.] one who holds by some conditional tenure from a superior. Adjectively, holding from another by some conditional tenure.

FEUDS, s. [plural; feodum, Lat.] in Law, lands that are hereditary.

FLORENCE, a celebrated and beautiful city of Italy, capital of Tuscany, situated in the middle of the Vale of Arno.

The prospect is bounded on every side by an amphitheatre of fertile hills, adorned with villages, country houses, and gardens. It was founded by the soldiers of Sylla, destroyed by Totila, and rebuilt by Charlemagne. For curiosities, this city is the principal in Italy, after Rome. The architecture of the houses, in general, is executed in a good taste, the streets are clean, and paved with large broad stones, chiseled so as to prevent the horses from sliding. The squares are spacious; and the palaces, churches, and other public structures, are in a splendid style of architecture, with pillars, statues, pyramids, and fountains. The city is divided into two unequal parts by the river Arno, over which are 4 bridges, within sight of each other. That called Ponte de la Trinita is built of white marble, and adorned with 4 statues, representing the seasons, and other ornaments. The Florentine merchants were formerly men of vast wealth; and one of them, about the middle of the 15th century, built that grand fabric, which from the name of its founder is still called the Palazzo Pitti. He failed under the prodigious expense of this building, which was immediately purchased by the Medici family, and was the residence of the grand dukes. Besides the gardens, furniture, antique statues, paintings, &c. which are justly and universally admired, here are various other curiosities, as the cabinets of arts, of astronomy, of natural history, of medals, of porcelain, of antiquities, &c. In the year 1530, Alex. de Medicis was created Grand Duke of Tuscany, by the Emperor Charles V. In 1737, the family of Medicis became extinct, and Florence and the duchy of Tuscany fell to the duke of Lorraine, afterwards emperor. The inhabitants are estimated at 60,000: it contains an university, and is 45 miles S. of Bologna, and 125 N. N. W. of Rome. Lat. 43. 46. N. lon. 11. 3. E.

America, 500 miles in length, and 130 in breadth, bounded on the W. by Louisiana, on the N. by Louisiana and Georgia, on the E. by the Atlantic, and on the S. by the Gulf of Mexico. It is divided into East and West. St. Augustine is the capital of the former, and Pensacola of the latter. The country about St. Augustine is the least fertile; yet even here two crops of Indian corn are annually produced. The banks of the rivers are of a superior quality, and well adapted to the culture of rice and corn. The interior country, which is high and pleasant, abounds in wood of almost every kind; particularly white and red oak, pine, hickory, cypress, red and white cedar. The intervals between the hilly parts are extremely rich, and produce spontaneously all the fruits common to Georgia and the Carolinas. In many places, vines are successfully cultivated, and the ranges of cattle are immense. Florida was discovered by Sebastian Cabot, in 1497, and after belonging alternately to the French, Spaniards, English, and Spaniards again, was ceded by the latter to the United States of America, in 1821.

FRANCE, a country of Europe, bounded on the N. by the British Channel and the Netherlands; on the E. by Germany, Switzerland, and Italy; on the S. by the Mediterranean Sea and Spain; and on the W. by the Atlantic ocean. From the Pyrenées in the S. to Dunkirk in the N. its length is 625 miles, and about the same extent from Strasburg in the E. to Brest in the W. though the average breadth is but about 460 miles. The air, particularly in the interior parts of the country, is, in general, mild and wholesome, and the weather more clear and settled than in England: in the northern provinces, however, the winters are intensely cold. The soil is agreeably diversified, and yields corn, wine, and oil; figs, prunes, and various high-flavoured fruits; tobacco, hemp, flax, manna, saffron, and many drugs. Silk is also produced in great plenty. The forests are extensive, and the mineral productions various. Its situation is favourable to commerce, and the inhabitants have long availed themselves of many of their natural advantages. The French language, being polite, elegant, and easy, is more generally spoken than any other in the world. The principal rivers of France are the Loire, the Rhône, the Garonne, the Seine, the Scheldt, the Rhine, the Somme, the Var, the Adour, &c. the advantages of which, in commerce and convenience, are considerably improved by the artificial rivers and canals which have been executed. The most considerable mountains, besides the Alps and the Pyrenées, are Mount Jura, the Cevennes, and Mont D'Or. Wolves excepted, France contains few animals, wild or tame, that are not to be found in England. France was formerly an absolute monarchy, and divided into military governments or provinces. But, in 1789 a wonderful revolution took place. The deranged situation of the finances of the country, chiefly occasioned by the American war, had induced the king Louis XVI. to convoke, first an assembly of the Notables, or principal men in the kingdom, and next (on the ineffectual result of their deliberations) the States-general, which had not been assembled since the reign of Louis XIII. in 1614. These consisted of three orders; the nobility, clergy, and the third estate, or commons. A contest arose, whether the three orders should make three distinct houses, or be blended in one assembly, the third estate insisted upon the latter; and, assuming the title of the National Assembly, declared themselves competent to proceed to business, without the concurrence of the other two orders. In the sequel, the nobility and clergy found it expedient to concede the point; and they all met in one hall. On the removal of the popular minister, M. Neckar, in July 1789, a dreadful insurrection ensued in Paris; the military refused to fire upon the people; the formidable Bastille was captured by the citizens; the governor, and some other obnoxious persons, were beheaded. On the 17th of July, the king visited the Hotel de Ville at Paris, and surrendered himself, as it were, to his people. The national assembly, now triumphant, abolished nobility, and the whole feudal system, confiscated the possessions of the clergy, and suppressed all the monasteries. In October, in consequence of a dreadful riot at Versailles, the king, the royal family, and the national assembly, removed to Paris, where the king was now little better than a state prisoner. From this irksome situation he attempted to escape, in June 1791, but was arrested at Varennes, and conducted back to Paris. The national assembly completed a new constitution, which was accepted by the king in September of the same year, when a new national assembly was elected; but harmony did not long prevail between this body and the king. Some of their decrees he refused to sanction; and they, among other offensive measures, disbanded his guard. At this time, France was involved in a war with the emperor, in his quality of king of Hungary, who, in concert with the king of Prussia, and the emigrant French princes, had taken up arms for the restoration of Louis to his former powers. The king professed not to countenance the invasion of the French territory; his sincerity was suspected; and in Aug. 1792, the mayor at Paris, at the head of a deputation from that city, appeared at the bar of the national assembly, and demanded the deposition of the king. At this moment the Thuilleries, the royal residence, was attacked; the Swiss guards were defeated and massacred; and the king and royal family took refuge in the national assembly, who instantly decreed the suspension of the regal power, and the convocation of a national convention. The king and his family were conveyed to a house in Paris called the Temple, and there kept in close confinement, with circumstances of the most humiliating degradation. The convention met on the 21st of September, and instantly decreed the abolition of royalty, and the formation of a republic on the principles of what was termed liberty and equality. In December following they brought the king to a mock trial, and in pursuance of their sentence, he was publicly beheaded on the 21st of January, 1793. All Europe exclaimed against the injustice and cruelty of this proceeding. Powers, hitherto neutral in the war, were eager to take an active part in it; and the new republic, in addition to the arms of Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, and the empire, had to encounter the powerful combination of Great Britain, the United Provinces, and Spain. This formidable coalition of the continental powers was, however, dissolved by the gigantic efforts of France, after they had suffered the severest reverses, and had their countries overrun by the republican armies; by which France acquired a vast accession to her territory and population, which before had been reckoned at not less than 25 millions. After the death of the king, various factions successively seized the helm of government, and destroyed each other. In the mean time the queen was brought to trial, condemned, and executed in October, 1793; and in May following, Madame Elizabeth, the late king's sister, was subjected to a similar fate. The Dauphin, (or Louis XVII.) and his sister, (now Duchess of Angoulême) remained in confinement, where the former is supposed to have died in 1795; but the latter was soon afterwards given up to the Emperor, in exchange for some revolutionary Deputies, who had fallen into his hands. On the 9th of November 1799, General Napoleon Buonaparte overturned the government of the day, and placed himself at the head of affairs, with the title of First Consul, having two other consuls associated with him in the government. Soon after this change, the Roman Catholic religion, which had been suppressed during the rage of revolution, was re-established in France, though on more moderate and liberal principles than before. On the 20th of May, 1804, the consular government was set aside; Buonaparte caused himself to be proclaimed Emperor of the French, and on the 2d of December, he was inaugurated by the pope at Paris. To this title he soon after added that of king of Italy; and by dissolving the Germanic body, and drawing the princes into his interest, Napoleon, in 1806, caused the emperor Francis to abdicate his ancient title. From 1804 to 1813, France exhibited a splendid succession of conquests; all Europe, with the single exception of Great Britain, owned her sway; and had Napoleon known how to set bounds to his desires, he might have reigned long and powerfully. The invasion of Russia, however, in 1813, proved his ruin. His army perished miserably in the frost and snow of that inhospitable climate; the powers of Europe, at the instigation of Great Britain, rose against him: the wreck of his forces, was overthrown at Leipsic, in the beginning of 1814; he returned to Paris, and was obliged to abdicate the government. The Bourbon family was recalled, and Louis XVIII. brother to Louis XVI. was proclaimed King, subject to a constitutional government. Napoleon was suffered to retain the Imperial title, and to retire to Elba, whence he returned in the spring of 1815, and for a short time recovered the throne. The battle of Waterloo, on the 18th June, however, put an end to his empire; he was totally defeated, and finding no friends in his adversity, fled to Rochfort, and surrendered himself to a British man of war, by which he was conveyed to England. He was not, however, suffered to land, but was transported to the island of St. Helena, where he was kept a prisoner till his death, which took place on the 7th of May, 1821. Louis XVIII. was restored to the throne of his ancestors, and France was reduced to nearly the same limits that it occupied prior to the Revolution.

FRANCE, Isle of, or Mauritius, an island in the Indian Ocean, about 150 miles in circumference. Indigo is the general object of cultivation. Its ebony is the most solid, close, and shining, of any in the world. Here are numerous groves of oranges and citrons, and the pineapple grows spontaneously. Here is also abundance of black cattle, venison, and wild fowl, with potatoes, and other leguminous roots. On the east and west sides are two fine harbours. This island was first discovered by the Dutch, in 1598, who gave it the name of Mauritius, in honour of the reigning prince of Orange. About 40 years after, they began to form settlements here; but in the beginning of the last century the colony was withdrawn, and the island was taken possession of by the French, who gave it the name of the Isle of France. In 1810, it was taken from them by the British, to whom it was finally ceded in 1814, and who have restored its first name of Mauritius. The inhabitants, black and white, are about 20,000. Lat. 20. 10. S. lon. 57. 29. E.

FRIENDLY ISLANDS, a cluster of islands in the South Pacific Ocean, so named by Capt. Cook, in 1773, on account of the friendship that seemed to subsist among the inhabitants, and their courteous behaviour to strangers. Tasman, the Dutch navigator, first touched here in 1643, and gave the names of New Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Middleburgh, to three of the principal islands. Cook explored the whole cluster, consisting of more than 20. Tonga, or New Amsterdam, is the largest, extending 21 miles from E. to W. and 13 from N. to S. intersected by straight and pleasant roads, with fruit-trees on each side, which provide shade from the scorching heat of the sun. Middleburgh is called Eaoowe by the natives, who have given the names of Annamooka, Tongataboo, Hapae, and Leefooga, to the other principal islands. The general appearance of these islands conveys an idea of exuberant fertility; the surface, at a distance, seems entirely clothed with trees of various sizes, some of which are uncommonly large, particularly the tall cocoa palm, and a species of fig, with narrow pointed leaves. It is almost wholly laid out in plantations, in which are some of the richest vegetable productions; such as bread-fruit, cocoa-nuts, plantains, yams, sugar-cane, and a fruit like a nectarine. Here are most of the articles which the Society Islands produce, and some which they have not. Their breed of hogs is as scanty as that of the Society Islands; but they received from the English some valuable additions to their stock, both of vegetables and animals. Their domestic fowls are as large as those of Europe. Among the birds are parrots and paroquets, of various sorts, which furnish the red feathers, so much esteemed in the Society Islands. The numerous reefs and shoals afford shelter to an immense variety of shell-fish. Agriculture, architecture, boat-building, and fishing, are the employments of the men; to the women is confined the manufacture of cloth. These islands lie between 19. 40. and 21. 30. deg. S. lat. and between 170. and 180. of W. lon. Under the general name of Friendly Islands, are sometimes comprehended Boscawen's, Keppel's, and Prince William's Islands, and the group of the Hapae Islands, amounting together to about 150.

FRIENDSHIP, s. [vrriendschap, Belg.] the state of minds united together by mutual benevolence; amity; the highest degree of intimacy; favour or personal kindness.

FRIESLAND, EAST, a principality of Westphalia, so called from its situation with respect to the Dutch province of Friesland; bounded on the N. by the German Ocean; on the E. by the county of Oldenburgh; on the S. by the bishopric of Munster; and on the W. and S. W. by the sea and Groningen. It consists chiefly of meadow land. The counts of Friesland becoming extinct in 1744, Frederick II. king of Prussia, seized the country, in consequence of the expectancy granted to the house of Brandenburg, in 1694, by the Emperor Leopold, in opposition to the claims of George II. king of England, as duke of Brunswick-Lunenburgh. In 1807, by the treaty of Tilsit, his Prussian Majesty was obliged to cede it to the Emperor Napoleon, who afterwards annexed it to Holland; and, in 1815, at the congress of Vienna, it was transferred to the king of Hanover. Embden is the capital.

FRIESLAND, WEST, one of the United Provinces, bounded on the S. and W. by the Zuyder Zee and Overijssel; on the N. by the German Ocean; and on the E. by Groningen and Overijssel. In Ostergow there is good pasturage, and some arable land; Westergow is more fenny, but abounds with fish and fowl. A dialect used here more nearly resembles the old English than any other in Europe. Lewarden is the capital. A part of North Holland is also called West Friesland.

G.

G The seventh letter, and fifth consonant, of the English alphabet. The letter G is of the mute kind, and cannot be sounded without a vowel. It has two sounds, one of which is called hard, because formed by a hard pressure of the tongue against the upper gums: this sound it always retains before a, o, u, l, r; as, game, gat, gore, god, gun, gull, glass, grass. The other sound, which is termed soft, resembles the sound of the j, and is commonly found before e or i, as in gem and gibbet; though not without exception; for in the words get, giddy, gift, give, and many more, as the reader will see pointed out in order, it retains the hard sound. At the end of words, gh is often sounded like ff, as in the words rough, tough, &c. yet not always, as in the words thorough, borough, &c. where it has scarce any sound at all. Before n, at the end of a word, it is not sounded, but serves only to lengthen the vowel which comes before it, according to the French, from whence these words are derived; as condign, malign, which are pronounced condin, malin. It is often silent before h in the middle of words, as in might, which is sounded mīt. This seems to have been derived to us from the Saxons, who, as Dr. Hickes informs us, pronounce it, in the beginning, middle, and ending of words, like a y, as in gate, which some rustics still pronounce yate; dæg, which we pronounce day; and in sægl, which we pronounce sail. As a numeral, G was anciently used to denote 400, and with a dash over it thus, Ġ, 40,000. In Music, it is the character or mark of the treble cleff; and from its being placed at the head, or marking the first sound in Guido's scale, the whole scale took the name of gamut.

GALVANISM, a name given to the influence discovered a few years ago by the celebrated Galvani, professor of anatomy at Bologna, and which, by himself, and some others, was at first, (though improperly) called animal electricity. The experiments which have been made by philosophers, upon animal bodies, may be reduced to the following; which may suffice to give the reader a correct notion of the subject.—Lay bare about an inch of a great nerve, leading to any limb or muscle. Let that end of the bared part which is farthest from the limb be in close contact with a bit of zinc. Touch the zinc with a bit of silver, while another part of the silver touches, either the naked nerve, if not dry, or, whether it be dry or not, the limb or muscle to which it leads. Violent contractions are thus produced in the limb or muscle, but not in any muscle on the other side of the zinc. Almost any two metals will produce the movements; but, it is believed, the most powerful are the following, in the order in which they are here placed: 1. Zinc; 2. Tin; 3. Lead; in conjunction with, 1. Gold; 2. Silver; 3. Molybdena; 4. Steel; 5. Copper. Upon this point, however, authors are not perfectly agreed.

GALWAY, a county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, about 82 miles long, and 42 broad; bounded on the N. by Mayo and Roscommon; on the E. by Roscommon, King's County, and Tipperary; on the S. by Clare and Galway Bay; and on the W. by the Atlantic. It contains 136 parishes, and about 142,000 inhabitants. A great part of it is fertile, being a warm limestone soil, which rewards the industry of the husbandman and shepherd; but is very coarse towards the N. and W. and in those parts rather thinly inhabited. The western coast contains many well-sheltered harbours, and is mostly bordered with green islands and rugged rocks.

GALWAY, a town of Ireland, in a county of the same name, of which it is the capital, advantageously situated for foreign trade on Galway Bay, in the Atlantic. The salmon and herring fisheries are carried on here with great spirit, and employ several hundred boats; the quantity of kelp manufactured and exported is considerable; and the increase of the linen manufacture has become very important. It sends one member to parliament, and is 40 miles W. S. W. of Athlone, and 120 W. by S. of Dublin.

GAMBADE, or GAMBA'DO, s. [plural gambades and gambadoes, from gamba, Ital.] a sort of leather boot fixed to a saddle, instead of stirrups, to put the legs in; a spatterdasher or gaiter; a boot worn above the shoe.

GAMBIA, a large river of Africa, which falls into the Atlantic Ocean. Its source is not known, but it is navigable for sloops about 600 miles up the country. At the mouth of the river the land is low, but, higher up, the country is rocky and mountainous, and covered with woods. Along its banks are great numbers of towns, inhabited by various nations. The Arabic language and Mahomedan religion generally prevail in the country N. of this river; on the S. the inhabitants are Pagans. The Gambia swarms with crocodiles, and annually overflows its banks, like the Nile. The mouth is in lat. 22. 28. N. and lon. 90. 20. W.

GAMUT, s. [gama, Ital.] the first note in the modern scale of music; the scale by which learners are taught to sound the musical tones. The invention of this scale is owing to Guido Aretine; though it is not so properly an invention, as an improvement of the diagram or scale of the Grecians.

'GAN, for began, from 'gin, for begin. "The noble knight 'gan feel his vital force to faint." Spenser.

To GANCH, v. a. [from gancio, Ital.] to drop from a high place upon hooks; a punishment practised in Turkey.

GANDER, s. [gandra, Sax.] the male of the goose.

GANG, s. a company or crew; as a ship's crew, or a company of robbers; a road, or way.

To GANG, v. n. [gangen, Belg. gangan, Sax.] to go; to walk: an old word still used in the North.

GANGES, a large and celebrated river of India, has its source in two springs near Mount Kentaiffe, in Thibet; the streams of which, after running 300 miles in a western direction, inclining to the N. turn to the S. unite their waters, and form what is properly called the Ganges, from the Hindoo word Ganga, which signifies the river. This great body of water then forces a passage through Mount Himmaleh, (a chain or ridge of mountains extending from Cabul along the N. of Hindoostan, and through Thibet,) and sapping its very foundation, rushes through a cavern, and precipitates itself into a vast basin, which it has worn in the rock, at the hither foot of the mountains. From this second source (as it may be termed) it takes a S. E. direction through the country of Sirinagur, until, at Hurdwar, it finally escapes the mountainous tract in which it has wandered about 800 miles. From Hurdwar, where it enters the plain country, it flows with a smooth navigable stream, 1200 miles, through delightful plains, to the Bay of Bengal, which it enters by several mouths. In its course it passes by Furrackabad, Allahabad, Benares, Patna, &c. and receives 11 rivers, some of which are equal to the Rhine, and none smaller than the Thames, besides others of inferior note. In the annual inundation of this immense river, the country is overflowed to the extent of more than 100 miles in width; nothing appearing above water but villages and trees, excepting, very rarely, the top of an elevated spot. The rise of the water is on an average about 31 feet. The Ganges is a most beneficial river, diffusing plenty by means of its living productions, enriching the lands, and affording an easy conveyance for the produce of its borders. The Hindoos hold its waters in high veneration. It is visited annually by pilgrims from all parts of Hindoostan; and happy are those accounted whose lot it may be to perish in its streams.

W. of London. Market on Thursday. In the neighbourhood are several cotton works.

GARTER, s. [gardus, Brit. jartier, Fr.] a string with which the stockings are tied up. A military order of knighthood, the most noble and ancient of any lay order in the world, instituted by king Edward III. This order consists of twenty-six knights companions, generally princes and peers, whereof the king of England is sovereign or chief. They are a college or corporation, having a great and lesser seal. Their officers are a prelate, chancellor, register, king at arms, and usher of the black rod. They have also a dean and twelve canons, petty canons, vergers, and twenty-six pensioners, or poor knights. The prelate is the head; an office vested in the bishop of Winchester, and has ever been so. Next to the prelate is the chancellor, whose office is vested in the bishop of Salisbury, and has always been so; he keeps the seals, &c. The next is the register, who is always the dean of Windsor, and who, by his oath, is to enter upon the registry the scrutinies, the elections, penalties, and other acts of the order, with all fidelity. The fourth officer is Garter, and king at arms, being two distinct offices united in one person. Garter carries the rod and sceptre at the feast of St. George, the protector of this order, when the sovereign is present. He notifies the election of new knights, attends the solemnity of new installations, carries the Garter to foreign princes, &c. He is the principal officer within the college of arms, and chief of the Heralds. All these officers, except the prelate, have fees and pensions. The habit of the order upon solemn days is the Garter, mantle, surcoat, hood, collar, great George, and cap; upon the collar days, they only wear the Garter, the collar of the order, and the great George: at the middle of the collar hangs the picture of St. George, sitting on horseback, who having thrown the dragon upon his back, encounters him with a tilting spear. The Garter, of dark blue, is worn a little below the knee of the left leg, having this motto wrought on it, Honi soit qui mal y pense. The origin of this order is somewhat differently related: the common account is, that it was instituted in honour of a garter of the countess of Salisbury, which she dropped when dancing with king Edward, and which he picked up; but our best antiquaries think it was instituted on account of the victory over the French at Cressy, where the king ordered his garter to be displayed as a signal of battle.

GARTER, KING AT ARMS, s. an officer whose business is to attend the service of the Garter, for which he is allowed a mantle and a badge, a house in Windsor castle, pensions from both the sovereign and knights, and fees.

To GARTER, v. a. to bind up the stocking with a band or garter. To invest with the Order of the Garter.

GENE'VA, an ancient, large, and populous city and republic, on the confines of France, Savoy, and Switzerland, at the S. W. extremity of a lake of the same name, lying partly in the plain, partly on a gentle ascent, and irregularly built. The houses are lofty; and many in the trading parts of the city have arcades of wood, even to the upper stories. These arcades, supported by pillars, give a gloomy appearance to the street, but are useful to the inhabitants in protecting them from the sun and rain. It contains about 24,000 people; but the territory or district is small. It was in alliance with the Swiss cantons; and after various revolutions, during near two centuries, the democrats, in 1789, prevailed over the aristocracy; and a constitution was established, favourable to the rights of the people. It afterwards became a part of the French empire, and capital of the department of the Lemane; but in the close of 1813, the French garrison abandoned the capital, on the appearance of an Austrian force; and in 1815, the whole territory of Geneva, with the districts of Chablais and Faucigny, ceded from Savoy, were annexed to the Swiss republic, as a new canton. The citizens of both sexes are remarkably well instructed; "and it is not uncommon," says Dr. Moore, "to find mechanics, in the intervals of labour, amusing themselves with the works of Locke, Montesquieu, and Newton, and other similar productions." It is 43 miles N. by E. of Chambéry, and 135 N. W. of Turin. Lat. 46. 12. N. lon. 6. 8. E.

GENE'VA, Lake of, anciently called Lemane, is in the shape of a crescent; Switzerland forming the concave, and Savoy the convex part; the greatest breadth being about 12 miles, and length 54. The greatest depth found by M. de Luc, is 160 fathoms. The Rhone runs through it from E. to W. after which it passes through the city, which it divides into two unequal parts.

GENE'VA, s. [from genèvre, Fr. a juniper-berry] a spirituous liquor distilled from juniper-berries, called gin by contraction.

GENII, s. pl. in the singular genie and genius, [Lat.] in the Mohammedan theology, a sort of intermediate beings, supposed to exist, between men and angels; of a grosser fabric than the latter, but much more powerful and active than the former. Some are reputed good, others bad; and capable of future salvation or damnation, like men. The Orientals suppose several ranks and degrees, or different species, among this kind of beings; some being peculiarly called Jin, or Genii; some Peri, or Fairies; some Div, or Giants; and others Tacwins, or Fates; of whom they relate many romantic stories, as may be seen in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

GENIO, s. [Ital.] a person of a particular turn of mind; the turn, disposition, or cast of the mind.

GENITALS, s. [not used in the singular, from genitalis, Lat.] the parts contributing to generation.

GENITING, s. [a corruption of janeton, Fr. signifying Jane, supposed to be so called in honour of some lady of that name] an early apple gathered in June.

GENITIVE, a. [genitivus, Lat.] in Grammar, the name of a case, by which property or possession is implied.

GENIUS, s. [Lat.] a supposed protection or ruling power of men, places, or things; a person endowed with faculties superior to another; a perfection of understanding; a disposition by which any person is by nature qualified or inclined to any particular science or employment; nature or disposition.

GE'NOA, a city of Italy, long the capital of an aristocratic republic, extending along the gulf of the same name for about 150 miles; but of an unequal breadth, varying from 8 to 12 miles. In the year 1798, the ancient government was overthrown by the influence of the French, and a democracy was established, under the title of the Ligurian republic. In 1805, it was annexed to the French empire, and so continued till early in 1814; when in the decline of Napoleon's power, the inhabitants put themselves under British protection, and suffered their city and strong places to be occupied with British troops, in expectation of having their independence restored. In the settlement of Europe, however, it was for political reasons transferred to the king of Sardinia, who, in 1815, assumed the title of Duke of Genoa. The city is about 10 miles in circumference, and built like an amphitheatre. The houses are 5 or 6 stories high, and well built, and the palaces and public buildings are numerous. The harbour is large and good, and, for its preservation, a mole is built 560 paces long, 13 broad, and 15 feet above the level of the water. The inhabitants are computed at about 80,000. It is one of the most commercial places in Italy, and has manufactures in velvet, plush, damask, and silk; and the banking business is carried on extensively. The Genoese were for a long time masters of Sardinia, Malta, Majorca, Minorca, Candia, Cyprus, the Crimea, and other places in the Archipelago, but their fleet, anciently celebrated for its victories over the Saracens, Pisanese, Venetians, Spaniards, and Turks, is now reduced to a few galleys. Genoa is 62 miles S. E. of Turin, and 224 N. W. of Rome. Lat. 44. 25. N. lon. 8. 58. E.

GENTEE'L, a. [gentil, Fr.] polite or elegant in behaviour or address; graceful or elegant in mien.

GENTEE'LY, ad. according to the rules of politeness.

GENTEE'LNES, s. elegance; gracefulness; politeness.

GENTIAN, s. a plant distinguished from others in the same class and order by having tubular blossoms.

GENTIANE'LLA, s. a kind of blue colour.

GENTILE, s. [gentilis, Lat.] one who worships idols, or false gods. A person of rank; this sense is obsolete.

GENTILISM, s. [gentilisme, Fr.] the worship of the heathens; idolatry.

GENTILITIOUS, a. [gentilitius, Lat.] belonging to, or characteristic of, a particular nation. Hereditary; entailed.

GENTILITY, s. [gentilité, Fr.] good extraction; dignity of birth; the class of those who are well-born.

GENTLE, a. [gentilis, Lat.] of an ancient and good family; pronounced in conversation genteel in this sense. Mild; tame; not easily provoked, applied to the temper. Soothing or pacifying. SYNON. Gentle animals are naturally so; tame ones are so, partly by the art and industry of man. The dog, the ox, and the horse, are gentle animals; the bear and the lion are sometimes tame.

GENTLE, s. a person of a good family; a gentleman. A kind of worm, like a maggot, used for a bait in fishing.

GENTLEFOLK, s. persons distinguished by their birth from the vulgar.

GENTLEMAN, s. [gentilhomme, Fr.] a person of a noble birth, or descended of a family which has long borne arms. Chamberlain observes, that, in strictness, a gentleman is one whose ancestors have been freemen, and have owed obedience to none but the prince; on which footing no man can be a gentleman but one who is born such. But among us, the term Gentleman is applicable to all above a yeoman; so that noblemen may be properly called gentlemen.

GENTLEMANLIKE, or GENTLEMANLY, a. becoming a man of birth.

GENTLENESS, s. softness; mildness; sweetness.

GENTLEWOMAN, s. a woman of birth, or one superior to the vulgar, both in wealth and behaviour.

GENTLY, ad. softly; slowly; kindly.

GENTOO'S, s. the aborigines of Hindoostan, in the East Indies. The same as Hindoos.

GENTRY, s. [from gentle, whence gentlery, contracted to gentry] a rank of persons between the nobility and the vulgar; rank derived from inheritance; birth.

GENUFLECTION, s. [genuflexio, Lat.] the act of bending the knee; adoration expressed by bending the knees.

GENUINE, a. [genuinus, Lat.] pure, or without any spurious mixture; natural; true; real; not counterfeit.

GENUINELY, ad. without adulteration; naturally.

GENUINENESS, s. freedom from any thing counterfeit, or from any adulteration; originality; purity.

GENUS, s. [Lat.] in Logic, a class of beings, or one common nature agreeing to, and comprehending under it many species; thus animal is a genus, because it agrees to, and comprehends under it, the several species of men, horses, whales, lions, &c. In Botany, a system or assemblage of several plants, agreeing in some one or more common characters, in respect to certain parts, whereby they are distinguished from all other plants.

GEOCENTRIC, a. [from γῆ and κέντρον, Gr. geocentrique, Fr.] in Astronomy, having the same centre with the earth. The Geocentric longitude or latitude of a planet is its place as seen from the earth.

GEODÆSIA, s. [γεωδαισία, Gr.] that part of practical geometry which teaches to measure surfaces, and to find the contents of all plane figures.

GEODÆTICAL, a. [from γεωδαισία, Gr.] relating to the art of measuring surfaces; comprehending or shewing the art of measuring lands.

GEOGRAPHER, s. [from γῆ and γράφω, Gr.] one who can describe the earth according to the position of its several parts, and is skilled in making maps, the use of the globes, and the situation and extent of the several countries in the world.

GEOGRAPHICAL, a. [γεωγραφικός, Gr.] belonging or relating to geography.

GEOGRAPHICALLY, ad. in a geographical manner; according to the rules of geography.

GEOGRAPHY, s. [γεωγραφία, Gr.] in a strict sense, the knowledge of the circles of the earthly globe, and the situation of the various countries on its surface. In a more extensive sense, it takes in a knowledge of the seas also; and, in its largest sense, a knowledge of the various customs, habits, and governments of nations; the figures, magnitude, and the different strata and products of its soil; the various animals of different countries; their climates, seasons, heat, weather, together with the art of laying their various appearances down in maps, charts, &c.

GEOLOGY, s. [γῆ and λόγος, Gr.] the doctrine or knowledge of the nature and state of the earth.

GEOMANCER, s. [from γῆ and μάντις, Gr.] one who pretends to tell future events.

GEOMANCY, s. [γῆ and μαντεία, Gr.] the act of casting figures; the act of foretelling by figures what shall happen.

GEOMANTIC, a. [from γῆ and μαντεία, Gr.] belonging to geomancy, or formed by a geomancer.

GEOMETER, s. [γεωμέτρης, Gr.] one skilled in the principles of geometry; a geometrician.

GEOMETRAL, a. [geometral, Fr.] pertaining or relating to geometry; prescribed by geometry.

GEOMETRIC, or GEOMETRICAL, a. [γεωμετρικός, Gr.] belonging to, prescribed, laid down by, or disposed according to, the principles of geometry.

GEOMETRICALLY, ad. [γεωμετρικός, Gr.] according to the rules of geometry.

GEOMETRICIAN, s. See GEOMETER.

To GEOMETRIZE, v. n. [γεωμετρέω, Gr.] to perform or act according to the principles of geometry.

GEOMETRY, s. [γεωμετρία, Gr.] originally the art of measuring the earth, or any distances thereon; at present used for the science of quantity, extension, and magnitude, considered in themselves, and without any regard to matter. It is divided into speculative, practical, and descriptive.

GEOPO'NICAL, a. [γῆ and πόνος, Gr. geoponique, Fr.] relating to agriculture, or the cultivation of the ground.

GEOPO'NICS, s. [γῆ and πόνος, Gr.] the science of cultivating the ground; the doctrine of agriculture.

GEORGE, s. [Georgius, Lat.] the figure of St. George on horseback, worn by the knights of the Garter as an ensign of their order; a brown loaf; an ancient gold coin.

GEORGE I. successor of queen Anne to the crown of Great Britain, was the eldest son of Ernest Augustus, duke, afterwards elector, of Brunswick-Lunenburg (or Hanover) by princess Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector palatine, and king of Bohemia, and of Elizabeth, eldest daughter of James I. He was born May 28, 1660, and succeeded his father as elector of Brunswick-Lunenburg, 1698. His succession to the British throne had been settled by an act of parliament called the Act of Succession, and immediately on the death of queen Anne, the regency met, and gave immediate orders for his proclamation. On September 18, 1714, he landed with his son (afterwards George II.) at Greenwich, and on the 20th they made their public entry through the city to St. James's. The prince royal was declared prince of Wales; the king was crowned October 20; and a new parliament met, March 17, 1715. In July the king gave the royal assent to an act for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies, commonly called the Riot Act, which is still in force. The same year, a rebellion broke out, it was headed by the earl of Mar in Scotland, who set up the Pretender's standard in the Highlands, in September; and the earl of Derwentwater and others appeared in arms, in the north of England, in October, and the Pretender was proclaimed in several places. On November 12, the latter were attacked by the king's troops, commanded by the generals Wills and Carpenter, in Preston, who defeated them on the 13th, and on the 14th obliged them to surrender, and throw themselves on the king's mercy. On the very day the rebels were subdued at Preston, Sunday, November 13, the duke of Argyle defeated the rebel army under the earl of Mar, consisting of about 8 or 9000 men, at Sheriffmuir, about 4 miles from Aberdeen; and the earl of Mar retreated to Perth after an obstinate fight. On December 22, the Pretender arrived in Scotland, in a Dunkirk privateer, and was presently met and complimented by the earl of Mar, and other of his adherents; but being closely pursued by the king's troops, on February 14, he, with the earl of Mar, and some other chiefs, found means to make their escape in a French ship; and soon after which the rebels dispersed; some submitting, and others being taken prisoners. Among them was their general Forster, as also the earls of Derwentwater, Nithsdale, Carnwath, Wintown, and other noblemen. Derwentwater and Kenmuir were beheaded on Tower-hill, February 24, 1715-16; Nithsdale and Wintown made their escape out of the Tower; and after the execution of some of the rebels, an act of grace passed. Robert Walpole, esq. was some time before made first commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer; and about the same time, the parliament attainted James Butler, duke of Ormond, of high treason, and confiscated his estate. A few weeks after, the king gave his royal assent to an act for enlarging the time of continuance of parliaments, whereby this and future parliaments were continued seven years, unless sooner dissolved by the crown, instead of three years, as by the triennial act passed in the reign of king William. The clause in the act of settlement, whereby, after it took place, the sovereign was not to go out of the kingdom without consent of parliament, was repealed at the end of the session; and his majesty, having constituted the prince of Wales guardian of the realm in his absence, set out for his German dominions. The kingdom was at this time in a very disturbed state, in consequence of continual bickerings between the Hanoverian and the Jacobite parties, and frequent riots took place. On the 28th of July, a mug-house, kept by one Read, where some friends to the Hanoverian succession were accustomed to resort, was attacked by some Jacobites, who, notwithstanding the interference of the sheriffs, and the reading of the Riot Act, proceeded to pull down the house and destroy the goods. The arrival of a party of the guards, however, put an end to their violence; five of the ringleaders were taken, and being afterwards tried and found guilty, were hanged near the place of their transgression, at the end of Salisbury-court, Fleet-street. In November, 1717, the Prince of Wales fell under the king's displeasure, and was ordered to leave St. James's. His royal highness therefore went to reside at Leicester-house, Leicester-fields; and, whenever the king went abroad afterwards, he committed the administration to a regency of lords justices. Towards the end of this year, a proclamation was published for lowering the gold coin; whereby guineas, that before went for 11. 1s. 6d. were ordered for the future to go for 11. 1s. On July 31, Sir George Byng entirely defeated the Spanish fleet in the Mediterranean, the Spaniards having attacked the citadel of Messina in Sicily, which had been agreed to be given up to the emperor. War was declared against Spain in December following, both by Great Britain and France; and the Spanish court resolved to retaliate by an invasion of the former, in favour of the Pretender. The Spanish fleet of about 50 transports, convoyed by four men of war, having on board the late duke of Ormond, about 5000 men, and arms for twice that number, sailed from Cadiz: but was entirely dispersed by a storm; the late earls of Seaford and Mareschal, and the marquis of Tullibardine, indeed landed at Kintailine, in Scotland, with about 400 men, mostly Spaniards, and were joined by about 1600 Highlanders; but major-general Wightman dispersed them, the Spaniards surrendering at discretion; while Seaford, Mareschal, and Tullibardine, found means to get back to Spain. In this year Lord Cobham took Vigo, and several incursions were made on the Spanish coast. The year 1720 was remarkable for the South sea scheme, when the greatest part of the nation turned stock-jobbers; South sea stock rose till it reached above 1000; but it fell faster than it rose, and many families were ruined by it, while a few got vast riches. The directors' estates were sold for the benefit of the sufferers; and they were incapacitated from sitting in either houses of parliament, or holding any office or place of trust, for ever. Sir Robert Walpole, who had resigned, was again made chancellor of the exchequer and first lord of the treasury; which post he held to the end of this reign, and for fifteen years after. In April, 1720, a reconciliation of the royal family was brought about, and the prince of Wales attended his majesty at St. James's. At his return he was attended by a party of the yeomen of the guards, as also of the horse-guards; and the foot-guards began likewise to mount guard at Leicester-house. April 15, 1721, the princess of Wales was delivered of William Augustus, duke of Cumberland. On June 22, 1722, died the great duke of Marlborough, whose obsequies were performed on August 9, with the utmost solemnity and magnificence. A new parliament met on October 9, 1722, when the king acquainted them with a conspiracy for overturning the established government, and setting up the Pretender. Christopher Layer, a counsellor of the Temple, was executed at Tyburn, May 17, 1723, and his head fixed upon Temple-bar, for being concerned in it. The parliament passed bills for inflicting pains and penalties on bishops Atterbury, Kelly, and Plunket, on the same account; whereby the first was banished, and the two last imprisoned for life. In 1725, the earl of Macclesfield, lord high chancellor, resigned the seals, and was fined 30,000*l.* and committed to the Tower till he paid it. He was succeeded by Sir Peter King, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. The same session, Henry St. John, lord viscount Bollingbroke, was restored to his estates, and an act passed for that purpose, though he was not restored to his title. The same year, 1725, the order of the Bath was revived, and 37 new knights were installed; about which time several of the Scottish Highland clans were disarmed by general Wade. Toward the end of this year died, in the castle of Athlen, where she had lived many years, Sophia Dorothy, who was married to his majesty, 1682; and by whom he had issue, George, Prince of Wales, afterwards George II. born October 30, 1683, and Dorothy Sophia, subsequently queen of Prussia, born 1687. On Sept. 3, 1725, a treaty was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Prussia; though the latter, in effect, soon deserted this alliance; but the States-General afterwards acceded to it. This treaty was designed as a balance to one which had been concluded between the courts of Vienna and Madrid. These counteralliances put Europe again in a flame, and three British squadrons were fitted out; one sent to the West Indies, another to the coast of Spain, and the third to the Baltic. In the beginning of the year 1727, the Spaniards laid siege to Gibraltar; which was suspended upon preliminary articles for a general pacification being signed, though they were not ratified till some time after the king's death. The parliament, which met on January 17, was prorogued on May 15. On June 3, his majesty embarked on board the Carolina yacht, and landed the 7th at Vaert in Holland, where he lay that night; on the 9th he arrived at Delden, between 11 and 12 at night, seemingly in good health. He set out next morning about 3 o'clock, was taken ill on the road, and died at the palace of his brother, the duke of York, at Osnaburgh, June 11, 1727, in the 68th year of his age, and 13th of his reign. George I. was plain and simple in his person and address; grave and composed in his deportment, though easy, familiar, and facetious in his hours of relaxation. Before he ascended the throne of Great Britain, he had acquired the character of a circumspect general, a just and merciful prince, and a wise politician, who perfectly understood, and steadily pursued, his own interest. With these qualities, it cannot be doubted but that he came to England extremely well disposed to govern his new subjects according to the maxims of the British constitution, and the genius of the people; and if ever he seemed to deviate from these principles, we may take it for granted that he was misled by the venal suggestions of a ministry, whose power and influence were founded on corruption. From the death of Charles II. to this period, England made a considerable figure in every branch of literature. Dr. Atterbury and Dr. Clarke distinguished themselves in Divinity: Mr. Whiston wrote in defence of Arianism: John Locke shone forth the great restorer of human reason: Cudworth traced the whole labyrinth of metaphysical argumentation: the earl of Shaftesbury raised an elegant though feeble system of moral philosophy: Berkley, afterwards bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, surpassed all his contemporaries in subtlety, and variety of metaphysical arguments, as well as in the art of deduction. Lord Bolingbroke's talents as a metaphysician have been questioned since his posthumous works appeared: great progress was made in mathematics and astronomy by Wallis, Halley, and Flamstead: the art of medicine owed some valuable improvements to the classical Dr. Friend and the elegant Dr. Mead. Among the poets of this æra we number John Phillips, author of a didactic poem called "Cider," a performance of real merit; he lived and died in obscurity: William Congreve, celebrated for his comedies, which are famous for wit, elegance, and regularity: Vanburgh, who wrote with more nature and fire, though with less art and precision: Steele, who in his comedies successfully ingrafted modern characters on the ancient drama: Farquhar, who drew his pictures from fancy, rather than from nature, and whose chief merit consists in the agreeable pertness and vivacity of his dialogue: Addison, whose fame as a poet greatly exceeded his genius, which was cold and enervate; though he yielded to none in the character of an essayist, either for style or matter: Swift, whose muse seems to have been mere misanthropy; he was a cynic rather than a poet; and his natural dryness and sarcastic severity would have been unpleasing, had not he qualified them by adopting the extravagant humour of Lucian and Rabelais: Prior, lively, familiar, and amusing: Rowe, solemn, florid, and declamatory: Pope, the prince of lyric poetry, unrivalled in satire, ethics, and polished versification: the agreeable Parnell: the wild, the witty, and the whimsical Garth: Gay, whose fables may vie with those of La Fontaine, in native humour, ease, and simplicity; and whose genius for pastoral was truly original. Dr. Bentley stood foremost in the list of critics and commentators. Sir C. Wren raised some noble monuments of architecture. The most remarkable political writers were Davenant, Hare, Swift, Steele, Addison, Bolingbroke, and Trenchard.

GEORGE II. (then in the forty-fourth year of his age) was proclaimed king of Great Britain on the 15th of June, 1727, being the day after the express arrived with the account of the death of his father. All the great officers of state continued in their places; Sir Robert Walpole kept possession of the treasury; and the system of politics established by the late king underwent no alteration. The parliament meeting on the 27th, both houses presented addresses of condolence and congratulation. The 29th, the commons resolved unanimously to grant to his majesty the same civil list, viz. 700,000*l.* per annum, as had been enjoyed by his father. On the 7th of August this parliament was dissolved, and a new one summoned. On the 11th of October the coronation of the king and queen was performed at Westminster Abbey with the usual solemnity. The 23d of January, 1728, the new parliament met, when warm disputes passed on the increase of the national debt; the debates, however, terminated in favour of the ministry. On the 27th of May his majesty put an end to the session. In the beginning of December his majesty's eldest son prince Frederic arrived in England from Hanover, where he had hitherto resided; was introduced into the privy council, and created prince of Wales. The congress opened at Soissons, for determining all disputes among the powers of Europe, proved ineffectual. The Spaniards still continued their depredations with impunity on the commerce of Great Britain. The court of Spain, indeed, at this juncture, seemed cold and indifferent with regard to a pacification with England. It had renewed a good understanding with France, and now strengthened its interest by a double alliance of marriage with the royal family of Portugal. The infanta of this house was betrothed to the prince of Asturias; while the Spanish infanta, formerly affianced to the French king, was now matched with the prince of Brazil, eldest son of his Portuguese majesty. The parliament meeting, according to their prorogation, on the 21st of January, 1729, in consequence of petitions delivered from the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Bristol, complaining of the Spanish depredations; the commons addressed his majesty to use his utmost endeavours to check such depredations: in answer to which, the king assured them that he would use the best endeavours to answer the desires of his people. An inquiry was made into the state of the public gaols; and it appearing that great cruelties had been practised in them, particularly on Sir William Rich, bart. who was found in the Fleet prison loaded with irons, by order of the warden; Thomas Bambridge, the then warden, and John Huggins, the late, &c. were committed close prisoners to Newgate. The 14th of May the king put an end to the session; and, having appointed the queen regent, went to Germany in order to settle some differences between the regency of Hanover and the king of Prussia. The parliament assembling on the 13th of January, his majesty congratulated them on his having concluded a peace with Spain. His speech, however, produced warm debates in both houses, in which the treaty of Seville did not pass inquiry without severe animadversion. The Emperor was so greatly offended at this treaty, that he prepared for war. Being in want of money, he set on foot a negociation for a loan in England, of 400,000*l.* which alarmed the ministry, who imagined that it would be made use of to disturb the repose of Great Britain; and therefore a bill was brought in, to prevent the subjects of England from lending money to foreign powers without the king's licence for that purpose, and was carried into a law. An endeavour was now made to lay open the East India trade, the charter of that company being then very near expiring. April the 9th, petitions were presented to the house of commons for that purpose; but notwithstanding their being warmly recommended by Sir John Barnard, and other eminent merchants, they were rejected, and the exclusive privilege vested in the company was protracted, by act of parliament, to the year 1766. Various other bills passed this session: the salt-tax was reduced; and a most excellent act passed for the better regulating of juries, which now prevents their being packed. The parliament was then prorogued to the 14th of July following. During this year every part of the kingdom was infested with robbers, assassins, and incendiaries. The sessions of parliament opened on Jan. 21. The Emperor and his ministers still continued to exclaim against the treaty of Seville. The address of thanks for his majesty's speech gave rise to strong debates in the house of commons. About this time a famous periodical paper, entitled the Craftsman, made its appearance. The late lord Bolingbroke assisted in writing it; but the avowed patron was said to be Mr. Wm. Pulteney, who fought a duel in the Green Park with Lord Hervey, on occasion of a remarkable political pamphlet. All law proceedings were ordered to be no more in Latin, but in English. The duke of Parma and Placentia dying in January this year, the Imperial troops took possession of those duchies; though by the treaty of Seville they were guarantied to Don Carlos, son to the king of Spain, and were also bequeathed to that prince by the late duke, in case the child, of which he then supposed his duchess to be pregnant, was still-born, or should die after its birth. Though this step seemed to threaten an immediate war, his Britannic majesty and the States General interposed their mediation so effectually with the Emperor, that he concluded a treaty with them, consenting to withdraw his troops from Parma and Placentia, on condition that the contracting powers concerned in the treaty of Seville should guaranty the Pragmatic Sanction, or succession of the Austrian hereditary dominions, to the heirs female of the Emperor, in case he should die without male issue. A new treaty, confirming this, was afterwards signed at Vienna, on July 22, between the Emperor and the kings of Great Britain and Spain; and the States General, after many difficulties, at last acceded to it, by which the Ostend East India company was abolished. In consequence, Sir Charles Wager sailed with a fleet for Spain: Don Carlos was quietly settled in Italy; and, on the duchess of Parma not proving pregnant, Sir Charles returned to England. The parliament met on the 13th January, when the dispute for and against a standing army was carried on, on both sides, with equal warmth, and sometimes acrimony. A bill passed both houses for reviving the salt duties. The affair of the Charitable Corporation being brought in, it appeared that some of its managers had been guilty of the most iniquitous proceedings: upon which Sir Robert Sutton and Sir Archibald Grant, were expelled the house. On this occasion, a letter from Belloni, the Pretender's banker at Rome, relative to the Charitable Corporation, was burnt by the common hangman at the Royal Exchange. A most infamous fraud was discovered by lord Gage in the sale of the forfeited estate of the late earl of Derwentwater; for which serjeant Birch and Denis Bond, esq. were expelled the house. The session was closed the 1st of June. This summer his majesty visited his German dominions; the queen being left as regent. The colony of Georgia was planted now by general Oglethorpe. The following remarkable instance of suicide happened in England this year. Richard Smith, a book-binder, and prisoner for debt within the liberties of the King's-bench, persuaded his wife to follow his example, in making away with herself, after they had murdered their little infant. This wretched pair were, in the month of April, found hanging in their bed-chamber at about a yard's distance from each other; and in a separate apartment the child lay dead in a cradle. The session of parliament, which opened on January 16, besides the usual debates on the pension bill, standing army, and the Spanish depredations, was distinguished by the famous Excise Scheme, which had almost produced a rebellion among the people, who clamoured so loudly against it, through all parts of the kingdom, that the ministry thought proper to drop the design. The commons voted 80,000*l.* as a marriage-dower for the princess royal, who was married to the prince of Orange (who came to England in November) on the 14th of March in the following year. They also voted 10,000*l.* for the purpose of transporting a great number of protestant Saltburghers, (who had fled their native country on account of a persecution raised against them on the score of their religion) to the infant colony of Georgia. The session ended on the 14th of June. On February 1, this year, died Augustus II. king of Poland, which gave rise to a dreadful war in Europe. Three parties were formed on this occasion; one in favour of Stanislaus, another for the elector of Saxony, and a third for a native of Poland, exclusive of Stanislaus, who was then in France, and was at last proclaimed king of Poland. Being his most Christian majesty's father-in-law, he was greatly assisted by that monarch, and arrived by land at Warsaw. Immediately the French king's troops under the duke of Berwick marched to the Rhine, and were very successful. Their arms were equally triumphant in Italy. An alliance had been projected between France, Spain, and Sardinia, in order to raise Don Carlos to the thrones of Naples and Sicily. Duke de Villars commanded under the king of Sardinia in Italy, where their arms made a very rapid progress against the Imperialists, from whom they took many towns. About this time the earl of Chesterfield resigned his post of lord high steward; the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham were deprived of their regiments; and lord King resigning the office of chancellor, it was conferred on Mr. Talbot, together with the title of a baron. The parliament was opened on the 17th of January. In this session, which was no less fertile in disputes between the ministry and opposition than any of the preceding, a bill to prevent the infamous practice of stock-jobbing was carried through both houses, and passed into a law for three years. On the 16th of April the session ended, soon after which the parliament was dissolved. About this time lord Stair was deprived of his regiment of dragoons for his conduct in parliament. On the continent, king Stanislaus was obliged to fly secretly from Dantzic, and leave the crown of Poland to Augustus elector of Saxony. The French were very successful in Germany. Prince Eugene commanded the Imperial army; and the duke of Berwick, who headed that of France, was killed before Philipsburgh. There was a very bloody campaign in Italy. Don Carlos took possession of Naples, of which his Catholic majesty had declared him king. Count de Merci, who commanded the Imperialists, was slain in the battle of Parma. Marshal Broglio, a French general, was routed, and lost about 2000 men. The great success of the French was owing chiefly to the bravery and conduct of the king of Sardinia. England, during these transactions, preserved a neutrality; and kept up a great naval force under the command of Sir John Norris, an able, though not a successful commander. Negotiations were entered into at the Hague for peace. Considerable armaments were carrying on in England, in order to preserve its tranquillity. The Pretender's eldest son served with peculiar marks of distinction in the army of Don Carlos. The new parliament was opened on Jan. 14. 1735 The election of the 16 Scotch peers engrossed the attention of the public and the parliament for some time. Great alterations were made in the mutiny-bill; the officers who enlisted men were required to carry every person who entered, before a magistrate, in order for such person to declare his assent or dissent. His majesty was addressed on the Spanish depredations; but the session breaking up on May 15, nothing was done in that matter. Soon after, the king visited his German dominions, leaving the queen regent. The conferences still continued at the Hague; where at last a suspension of arms was agreed on, during which the negotiations for a general peace in Germany and Italy were continued. A quarrel breaking out between the courts of Madrid and Lisbon, the latter applied for assistance to the king of Great Britain, who sent Sir John Norris, with a powerful squadron, to Lisbon. The parliament met on 1736 Jan. 15, and repealed the old statutes of England and Scotland against conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil spirits; and passed an act for restraining the retail of spirituous liquors, the mortmain act, another for the prevention of smuggling, and another for building a bridge at Westminster. The session closed on May 20, soon after which the king paid a visit to his German dominions. On the 27th of April the prince of Wales was married to the princess of Saxe Gotha. The other remarkable incidents of this year were these: the king erected a new post of honour, entitled field-marshal of the armies of Great Britain. A great disturbance happened at Edinburgh, occasioned by the execution of one Wilson, a smuggler. Porteus, captain of the city-guard, having commanded the soldiers to fire among the populace, several innocent persons were killed. Porteus, being tried for his life, was found guilty; but being respited by the queen (then regent,) the mob forced open the prison doors, dragged forth Porteus, and hung him upon a dyer's pole; at which outrage her majesty and the administration were greatly offended. There now started up a new state phenomenon, Theodore Baron Stein, born near Cologne, in Germany. He had landed in Corsica, subject to the Genoese, who had treated the Corsicans with great rigour. The baron, being received with open arms by the insurgents, was elected, and crowned their king; upon which he headed their troops. Failing afterwards in his promises of men, money, &c. the Corsicans grew weary of him; whereupon he left their island. He had the air of a great man, but his parts were not shining, his principal talent being a little cunning; besides which, he was insolent and cruel. By this time all the belligerent powers in Italy had agreed to the preliminaries of peace concluded between the emperor and France. Don Carlos was crowned king of Sicily; Stanislaus abdicated the crown of Poland; and Augustus was universally acknowledged sovereign of that kingdom. The preliminaries were approved and accepted by the diet of the empire; the king of Spain sent orders for his troops to evacuate Tuscany; and the provinces in Italy yielded to the house of Austria. Prince Eugene, who had managed the interests of the Emperor on this occasion, did not live to see the happy fruits of his negotiation. He died at Vienna, in April, at the age of seventy-three, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero, and consummate politician. The beginning of this year was distinguished by a rupture in the royal family, occasioned by the prince of Wales 1737 carrying away the princess of Wales, then near her time, from Hampton-court, where their majesties resided, to St. James's, where she was that night delivered of the princess Augusta, afterwards princess of Brunswick. This breach was greatly widened by a motion being made in parliament (which was opened by commission Feb. 1.) to settle 100,000*l.* per annum on the prince of Wales, in the same manner that his majesty had enjoyed it before his accession to the throne. This motion, however, was negatived. The most remarkable bills passed this session were, a bill for punishing the magistrates and city of Edinburgh on account of the murder of captain Porteus; and another for limiting the number of playhouses, and subjecting all dramatic pieces to the inspection of the lord-chamberlain, commonly called the Playhouse Bill. In February died lord-chancellor Talbot, universally lamented, who was succeeded on the bench by lord Hardwicke: and on Nov. 20, died queen Caroline, in the 55th year of her age. The affair of one Jenkins, 1738 who was said to have had his ears cut off by the crew of a Spanish guarda-costa, and who appeared at the bar of the house of commons, excited great indignation both in that assembly and in the whole nation. Petitions, complaining of the Spanish depredations, were presented to the house from various quarters. An address was presented to his majesty, who soon after sent a strong squadron to the Mediterranean. The effect of this vigorous disposition was, that in September preliminaries were signed for an accommodation between the courts of England and Spain. On the 24th of May (O. S.) his late majesty was born. 1739 On the 14th of Jan. the famous CONVENTION treaty was concluded between the courts of Great Britain and Madrid, which occasioned very warm debates in both houses of parliament, and against which petitions were presented from all parts of the kingdom. Disputes were carried so high in the house of commons, that many eminent members of the minority retired from parliament, and 40 peers entered their protest against the address for thanking his majesty for laying the Convention before them. Notwithstanding the Convention so recently concluded, the behaviour of the Spaniards was so insolent, that a rupture with them became inevitable. War was accordingly declared against Spain, and admiral Vernon sent in July with a squadron of ships to annoy their commerce and settlements in America, where in November he took the town of Porto Bello. Mr. Whitfield's followers first appeared, under the name of Methodists; and the close of this year and the beginning of the next, were distinguished by as great a frost as ever was known in England. A strong armament being sent against the Spanish West Indies, under lord Cathcart, occasioned the French to lay aside the neutrality they had before professed, and to declare in favour of the Spaniards, by sending a fleet of 12 large ships to their assistance. On the 8th of May, the princess Mary was married by proxy to the prince of Hesse Cassel. In June advice was received from admiral Vernon, that he had bombarded Carthage, and taken fort Chagre. On the 20th October, Charles VI. emperor of Germany, the last prince of the house of Austria, died at Vienna, and was succeeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldest daughter the archduchess Maria Theresa, married to the grand duke of Tuscany. Though she succeeded as queen of Hungary, by virtue of the pragmatic sanction, guaranteed by all the powers in Europe, her succession produced such contests as kindled a cruel war in the empire. The young king of Prussia was no sooner informed of the Emperor's death, than he entered Silesia at the head of twenty thousand men, seized certain fiefs to which his family laid claim, and published a manifesto, declaring that he had no intention to contravene the pragmatic sanction. The elector of Bavaria refused to acknowledge the archduchess as queen of Hungary and Bohemia. His majesty, in his speech to the parliament, declared strongly in this princess's favour: and 300,000*l.* were granted to enable him to support her. Debates ran very high this session against the minister and his measures. A strong protest was entered by 24 peers, warmly reflecting on Sir Robert Walpole's management during the course of the war; and a variety of motions were made in both houses, tending to shew the necessity of removing him from his majesty's presence and councils. The year 1741 was remarkable for general Wentworth and admiral Vernon's unsuccessful expedition against Carthage, in which it is computed 20,000 British subjects lost their lives. The affairs of the continent were now more than ever embroiled. The queen of Hungary refusing to comply with the king of Prussia's demand of part of Silesia, that monarch prosecuted his conquests with great rapidity. France resolved to seize this opportunity of crushing the house of Austria. In order to prevent the queen of Hungary from receiving the promised succours from his Britannic majesty, she poured a numerous army into Westphalia, which produced a neutrality for Hanover; and the king of Great Britain promised to vote, at the ensuing election of an emperor, for the elector of Bavaria. The design of the French court was to raise this prince to the imperial dignity, and furnish him with such succours as should enable him to deprive the queen of Hungary of her hereditary dominions. With this view she sent two large bodies of troops into Germany: and the elector of Bavaria, seeing himself at the head of 70,000 men, declared war against her Hungarian majesty, and made so rapid a progress, that Vienna itself was threatened. Being joined by the elector of Saxony, he took Prague, and was crowned king of Bohemia. But by turning aside to Bohemia, instead of marching to Vienna, he entirely ruined his affairs. In the new parliament the minister was attacked with such spirit and violence, that he resolved to resign. He still attended 1742 the house, till the decision of the Chippenham election, which was carried the 2d February against him, by one vote only. He had been treated with so little ceremony during the course of the debate, that he protested in the lobby he would never enter the house again; and prince Frederic declaring, that he thought Sir Robert Walpole so great a bar between his majesty and his people, that he could agree to no terms of reconciliation till he should be removed, Sir Robert resolved to retire from power, and gave up all his places. This he did accordingly on the 11th February, after having been created by his majesty baron of Houghton, viscount Walpole, and earl of Orford. The day after his resignation, the opposition had a grand meeting: the purport of which was to bring him to justice, and to execute their constitutional points. The heads of the opposition all met at court, when a reconciliation was made between his majesty and the prince of Wales. Sir Robert Walpole's removal did not alter the measures: but there were many changes in the higher employments. Mr. Sandys was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, lord Wilmington first lord of the treasury, lord Harrington lord president, lord Carteret secretary of state, the marquis of Tweeddale secretary of state for Scotland, the duke of Argyle master of the ordnance, and Mr. Pulteney was restored to the dignity of a privy counsellor. A considerable promotion was made of general officers, and great changes in the inferior departments. An inquiry was made into the conduct of Sir Robert Walpole, in the course of which it appeared that he had been guilty of many malpractices; but before the report of the committee, who sat for that purpose, was finished, the parliament was prorogued, and thus the inquiry dropped. On the 12th of February the elector of Bavaria was chosen emperor of Germany. However, the queen of Hungary's affairs had taken a very auspicious turn. A bloody battle was fought at Czaslau, between the king of Prussia and prince Charles, in which the former had the advantage. By the happy influence of his Britannic majesty, a treaty was concluded between Austria and Prussia, whereby Silesia was given up to the latter: to which treaty Saxony also acceded; and peace was proclaimed at Dresden, Sept. 17. This obliged the French to retire with great precipitation and loss to Prague, which prince Charles besieged with 60,000 men, there being 26,000 men in that city. Negotiations were carried on between the generals on the respective sides. During the siege of Prague, the French made many desperate sallies; but being at last pressed by famine, Maillebois marched with 42,000 men to its relief. Count de Saxe then made his appearance at the head of a French army. Prince Charles turned the siege of Prague into a blockade. The Austrians, finding themselves too weak to continue the blockade before Prague, raised it; upon which the marshals Belleisle and Broglie marched out of that city, but were afterwards forced to return into it. Maillebois proved himself an able general during all this expedition. At last marshal Belleisle, with great skill and judgment, marched his army out of Prague, and reached Egra in 12 days without losing a man (according to his own account) except by the severity of the weather. In order to make a diversion in favour of the queen of Hungary, 16,000 British troops were embarked for the Netherlands, under the command of the earl of Stair, where they were joined by another body of Hanoverians and Hessians. A body of Austrians had also been before assembled in that country; but all these troops went into winter-quarters without executing any enterprise. Nov. 17, 1743, princess Louisa, his majesty's youngest daughter, was married by proxy to the prince royal of Denmark. The British fleet under Sir Chaloner Ogle was no ways fortunate in America. Commodore Knowles was sent out with a squadron of ships to attack La Guirre and Porto Cavallo, on the coasts of the Caraccas; but this attempt miscarried. He afterwards attacked Porto Cavallo, but without success. A revolution in the ministry took place this year, Mr. Pelham being placed at the head of the ministry. In the Netherlands, the English and French armies came to an engagement at the village of Dettingen. The order of battle, as directed by his Britannic majesty, was very masterly. The king, advancing to the front of his army, gave fresh spirits to the soldiers. The British troops fired too soon, upon the marching up of the enemy; when the French black musquetaires, detaching themselves from their lines, and galloping between the allied foot, were all cut to pieces. The firing now became general; when the presence of his Britannic majesty, who was in the posts of the greatest danger, and behaved with the noblest intrepidity, fixed the fate of the day. Marshal Noailles shewed great bravery in this battle. The duke of Cumberland, being in the hottest of the engagement, was wounded in the calf of the leg. Hereupon marshal Noailles, after losing the flower of his army, ordered a retreat. In this battle the French lost 6000 men, and a multitude of officers, with some trophies; and the English 2500 men. France was now deprived of her ablest minister by the death of cardinal Fleury, who was succeeded by cardinal Tencin, a man of a proud, turbulent, and enterprising disposition. The former was always a friend to pacific measures, and has been accused of having neglected the military glory of France, and permitting her naval power to be almost annihilated. In 1744, commodore Anson returned from his expedition round the world. In September, 1740, he had sailed with a small squadron to the South Sea, in order to annoy the Spanish settlements of Chili and Peru. Two of his large ships, having been separated from him in a storm before he weathered Cape Horn, had put in at Rio de Janeiro, on the coast of Brazil, from whence they returned to Europe. Mr. Anson having undergone a dreadful tempest, which dispersed his fleet, arrived at the island of Juan Fernandez, where he was joined by the Gloucester, a ship of the line, a sloop, and a pink loaded with provisions. These were the remains of his squadron. He made prizes of several vessels; took and burned the little town of Payta; set sail from the coast of Mexico for the Philippine isles; and in this passage the Gloucester was abandoned and sunk: the other vessels had been destroyed, for want of men to navigate them; so that nothing now remained but the commodore's own ship, the Centurion, and that but very indifferently manned; for the crews had been horribly thinned by sickness. Incredible were the hardships and misery they sustained from the shattered condition of the ships, and the scorbutic disorder, when they reached the plentiful island of Tinian, where they were supplied with the necessary refreshments. Thence they prosecuted their voyage to the river of Canton in China, where the commodore ordered the ship to be sheathed and found means to procure a reinforcement of sailors. The chief object of his attention was the rich annual ship that sails between Acapulco and Mexico, and Manilla, one of the Philippine islands. In hope of intercepting her, he set sail from Canton, and steered his course back to the straits of Manilla, where she actually fell into his hands, after a short but vigorous engagement. The prize was called Nuestra Signora de Cabadonga, mounted with 40 guns, manned with 600 sailors, and loaded with treasure and effects to the value of 313,000 pounds sterling: with this windfall he returned to Canton; from whence he proceeded to the Cape of Good Hope, and prosecuted his voyage to England, where he arrived in safety. Meanwhile the French went on with vigour in every quarter: they opposed prince Charles of Lorraine; they interrupted his progress in his attempts to pass the Rhine, and gained some successes in Italy; but their chief expectations were placed in a projected invasion of England. An invasion therefore was actually projected. Charles, the son of the old Chevalier St. George, departed from Rome in the disguise of a Spanish courier, prosecuted his journey to Paris, and had an audience of the French king. The troops designed for this expedition amounted to 15,000: preparations were made for embarking them at Dunkirk, and some other of the nearest ports to England, under the eye of the young Pretender, and 7000 of the number actually went on board. The duke de Roquefeuille, with 20 ships of the line, was to see them landed safely in England; and count Saxe was to command them, when put ashore. The whole project, however, was disconcerted by the appearance of Sir John Norris with a superior fleet making up against them; the French fleet was obliged to put back, and a very hard gale of wind damaged their transports beyond redress. All hopes of invasion were now frustrated; and, at length, the French thought fit openly to declare war. But though fortune seemed to favour England on this occasion, yet on others she was not equally propitious. The combined fleets of France and Spain for some time fought the British armament, under admirals Matthews and Lestock, though with inferior force, and came off nearly upon equal terms. Such a parity of success in England was regarded as a defeat. Both the English admirals were tried by a court-martial. Matthews, who had fought the enemy with intrepidity, was declared incapable of serving for the future in his majesty's navy: Lestock, who had kept aloof, was acquitted with honour; for he had entrenched himself within the punctilios of discipline; he barely did his duty: a man of honour, when his country is at stake, should do more. The proceedings in the Netherlands were still more unfavourable. The French besieged and took Fribourg, before they went into winter-quarters; and early the next campaign invested the city of Tournay. The allies were resolved to prevent the loss of this city by a battle. Their army was inferior, and they were commanded by the duke of Cumberland. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, they 1745 marched towards the enemy, and took post in sight of the French, who were encamped on an eminence; the village of Antoine on the right, a wood on their left, and the town of Fontenoy before them. This advantageous disposition did not repress the ardour of the English; on the 30th day of April, the duke of Cumberland marched to the attack at two o'clock in the morning. The British infantry pressed forward, bore down all opposition, and for near an hour were victorious. Marshal Saxe was at that time sick of the same disorder of which he afterwards died. He visited all the posts in a litter; and saw, notwithstanding all appearances, that the day was his own. The English column, without command, by a mere mechanical courage, had advanced upon the enemy's lines, which formed an avenue on each side to receive them. The French artillery began to play upon this forlorn body; and though they continued a long time unshaken, they were obliged to retreat about three o'clock in the afternoon. This was one of the most bloody battles that had been fought this age; the allies sustained a loss of near 12,000 men, among whom were lieutenant-general Sir James Campbell, major-general Ponsonby, the colonels Carpenter and Douglas, lieutenant-colonel Gee, and a great number of other officers. The victory cost the French an equal, if not a greater number of lives. The duke de Gramont, and three other lieutenant-generals, four major generals, and three brigadiers, were slain. Among the wounded were two lieutenant-generals, three major-generals, and thirty-six brigadiers and colonels; and but few of these long survived. This blow, by which Tournay was taken, gave the French a manifest superiority all the rest of the campaign, which they did not forego during the continuance of the war. The intended French invasion had roused all the attention of the English ministry, and nothing but loyalty breathed throughout the whole kingdom. The admirals Rowley and Warren had retrieved the honour of the British flag, and made several rich captures. Louisburg, in the island of Cape Breton, in North America, a place of great consequence to the British commerce, surrendered to general Pepperel; while, a short time after, two French East India ships, and another from Peru laden with treasure, supposing the place still in possession of the French, sailed into the harbour, and their capture added to the English success. It was in this period of universal satisfaction, that the son of the old Pretender resolved to make an effort at gaining the British crown. Being furnished with some money, and still larger promises, from France, he embarked for Scotland on board a small frigate, accompanied by the marquis of Tullibardine, Sir Thomas Sheridan, and a few other desperate adventurers. For the conquest of the whole British empire, he brought with him seven officers, and arms for 2100 men. Fortune, which ever persecuted his family, seemed no way more favourable to him: his convoy, a ship of 60 guns, was so disabled in an engagement with an English man of war, called the Lion, that it returned to Brest, while he was obliged to continue his course to the western parts of Scotland; and landing on the coast of Lochabar, July 27, was in a little time joined by some chiefs of the Highland clans and their vassals. By means of these chiefs, therefore, he soon saw himself at the head of 1500 men; and invited others to join him by his manifestos, which were dispersed throughout all the Highlands. The ministry was no sooner confirmed of the truth of his arrival, which at first they could scarcely be induced to believe, than Sir John Cope was ordered to oppose his progress. In the mean time, the young adventurer marched to Perth, where the unnecessary ceremony was performed of proclaiming the Chevalier de St. George, his father, king of Great Britain. The rebel army descending from the mountains, seemed to gather as it went. They advanced towards Edinburgh, which they entered without opposition. Here too the pageantry of proclamation was performed, August 17, in which he promised to dissolve the Union, and redress the grievances of the country. But, though he was master of the capital, yet the citadel, which goes by the name of the Castle, a strong fortress built upon a rock, and commanded by general Guest, braved all his attempts. In the mean time Sir John Cope, who had pursued them to the Highlands, but declined meeting them in their descent, now reinforced by two regiments of dragoons, resolved to march towards Edinburgh, and give them battle. The young adventurer, unwilling to give him time to retreat, attacked him near Prestonpans, about twelve miles from the capital, and, in a few minutes, put him and his troops totally to the rout. This victory, in which the king lost about 500 men, gave the rebels great influence; and had the Pretender taken advantage of the general consternation, and marched towards England, the consequence might have been dangerous to the safety of the state; but he spent the time at Edinburgh, seeming to enjoy the useless parade of royalty, pleased at being addressed and treated as a king. By this time he was joined by the earl of Kilmarnock, the lords Elcho, Balmerino, Ogilvy, Pitsligo, and the eldest son of the lord Lovat. While the young pretender thus trifled away the time at Edinburgh, (for all delays in dangerous enterprises are even worse than defeats) the ministry of Great Britain took every possible measure to defeat his intentions. Six thousand Dutch troops, that had come over to the assistance of the crown, were sent northward, under the command of general Wade; but, as it was then said, these could lend no assistance, as they were, properly speaking, prisoners of France, and upon their parole not to oppose that power for the space of one year. However this be, the duke of Cumberland soon after arrived from Flanders, and was followed by another detachment of dragoons and infantry; volunteers in different parts of the kingdom employed themselves in the exercise of arms; and every county exerted a generous spirit of indignation, both against the ambition, the religion, and the allies of the young adventurer. In the mean time, Charles went forward with vigour; and, resolving to make an irruption into England he entered it by the western border. On the 6th day of November, Carlisle was invested, and in less than three days it surrendered. Here he found a considerable quantity of arms, and was declared king of Great Britain. General Wade, being apprised of his progress, advanced across the country from the opposite shore; but receiving intelligence that the enemy were two days march before him, he retired to his former station. The young Pretender now resolved to proceed, having received assurances from France, that a considerable body of troops would be landed on the southern coast of Britain, to make a diversion in his favour; and flattered with the hopes of being joined by a large body of English malcontents, as soon as he should make his appearance among them. Leaving therefore a small garrison in Carlisle, which he should rather have left defenceless, he advanced to Penrith, marching on foot in an Highland garb, and continued his irruption till he came to Manchester, where he established his head-quarters. He was here joined by about 200 Englishmen, who were formed into a regiment, under the command of Colonel Townley. From thence he prosecuted his rout to Derby, intending to go by the way of Chester into Wales, where he hoped for a great number of adherents. He was by this time advanced within 100 miles of the capital, which was filled with terror and confusion. The king resolved to take the field in person. The volunteers of the city were incorporated into a regiment. The practitioners of the law agreed to take the field, with the judges at their head. Even the managers of the theatres offered to raise a body of their dependents for the service of their country. Yet these combinations only served as instances of the national terror; for the trading part of the city, and those concerned in the money corporations, were overwhelmed with dejection. They could hope for little safety in the courage or discipline of a militia; especially as they every hour dreaded an invasion from France, and an insurrection of the Roman Catholics, and other friends to the expelled family. This therefore was the moment for the advancement of the adventurer's enterprise. Had he marched up to the capital, he would undoubtedly have been joined by several secretly attached to his cause. But he determined once more to retreat to Scotland; and thus his scheme was defeated. In fact, he was but nominally the leader of the forces. His generals, the chiefs of Highland clans, were, from their education, ignorant; and from their independency, obstinate. They each embraced peculiar systems, and began to contend with each other for the pre-eminence; so that, after violent disputes, they resolved to march back. They effected their retreat to Carlisle without any loss; and from thence crossed the rivers Eden and Solway into Scotland. In this irruption, however, they preserved all the rules of war; they desisted, in a great measure, from rapine, levied contributions, and, in the usual form, left a garrison in Carlisle at their retreat; which, a short time after, to the number of 400, surrendered to the duke of Cumberland prisoners at discretion. The Pretender being returned to Scotland, proceeded to Glasgow; from which city he exacted severe contributions. Advancing to Stirling, he was joined by lord Lewis Gordon, at the head of some forces which had been assembled in his absence. Other clans, to the number of two thousand, came in likewise; Spain sent him some supplies of money; and, in one or two skirmishes with the royalists, his generals came off with victory; so that his affairs once more seemed to wear an aspect of success. Being joined by lord John Drummond, he invested the castle of Stirling, commanded by general Blakeney; but his forces, being unused to sieges, consumed much time to no purpose. General Hawley, who commanded a considerable body of forces near Edinburgh, undertook to raise the siege. He advanced towards the rebel army, and rendezvoused his whole forces at Falkirk, while the rebels lay encamped at no great distance. After two days mutually examining each other's strength, the rebels, on Jan. 17, came on in full spirits to attack the king's army. The Pretender, who stood in the front line, gave the signal to fire; and the first volley served to put Hawley's forces into confusion. The horse retreated with precipitation, and fell in upon their own infantry: the rebels followed their blow; and the greatest part of the royal army fled with the utmost precipitation. They retired in confusion to Edinburgh, leaving the field of battle, with part of their tents and artillery, to the rebels. This was the end of all their triumphs. But a new scene of conduct was now going to open; for the duke of Cumberland, at that time the favourite of the English army, had put himself at the head of the troops at Edinburgh, which consisted of about fourteen thousand men. He resolved therefore to come to a battle as soon as possible; and marched forward, while the young adventurer retired at his approach. The duke advanced to Aberdeen, where he was joined by the duke of Gordon, and some other lords, attached to his family and cause. After having refreshed his troops there for some time, he renewed his march: and in twelve days came upon the banks of the deep and rapid river Spey. This 1746 was a place where the rebels might have disputed his passage; but they seemed now totally void of all counsel and subordination, without conduct, and without expectation. The duke still proceeded in his pursuit; and, at length, had advice that the enemy had advanced from Inverness to the plain of Culloden, which was about nine miles distant, and there intended to give him battle. On April 5, this plain the Highlanders were drawn up in order of battle, to the number of eight thousand men, in thirteen divisions, supplied with pieces of artillery. The battle began about one o'clock in the afternoon; the cannon of the king's army did dreadful execution among the enemy; while theirs, being but ill served, was ineffectual. One of the greatest errors in all the Pretender's warlike measures, was his subjecting undisciplined troops to the forms of artful war, and thus repressing their native ferocity, from which alone he could hope for success. After they had stood the English fire for some time, they at length became impatient for closer engagement; and about five hundred of them attacked the English left wing with their accustomed fierceness. The first line being disordered by this onset, two battalions advanced to support it, and galled the enemy by a terrible and close discharge. At the same time the dragoons, under Hawley, and the Argyleshire militia, pulling down a park wall that guarded the enemy's flank, and which the rebels had left but feebly defended, fell in among them sword in hand, with great slaughter. In less than thirty minutes they were totally routed, and the field was covered with their wounded and slain, to the number of about three thousand men. The duke, immediately after the decisive action at Culloden, ordered six-and-thirty deserters to be executed; the conquerors spread terror wherever they came; and in a short time, the whole country round was one scene of slaughter, desolation, and plunder; justice seemed to be forgotten, and vengeance assumed the name. In the mean time, the unhappy fugitive adventurer wandered from mountain to mountain, a wretched spectator of all these horrors, the results of his ill-guided ambition. He now underwent a similarity of adventures with Charles II. after the defeat at Worcester. He sometimes found refuge in caves and cottages, without attendants, and exposed to the mercy of peasants, who could pity but not support him. Sometimes he lay in forests with one or two companions of his distress, continually pursued by the troops of the conqueror, as there were thirty thousand pounds bid for his head. Sheridan, an Irish adventurer, was he who kept most faithfully by him, and inspired him with courage to support such incredible hardships. He was obliged to trust his life to the fidelity of above fifty individuals. One day having walked from morning till night, pressed by hunger, and worn by fatigue, he ventured to enter a house, the owner of which he well knew was attached to the opposite party; "The son of your king," said he, entering, "comes to beg a bit of bread and clothes. I know your present attachment to my adversaries, but I believe you have sufficient honour not to abuse my confidence, or to take advantage of my misfortunes. Take these rags, that have for some time been my only covering, and keep them. You may, probably, restore them to me one day, when seated on the throne of the kings of Great Britain." His host was touched with his distress, assisted him as far as he was able, and never divulged the secret. In this manner he wandered among the frightful wilds of Glengary, for near six months, often hemmed round by his pursuers, but still finding some expedient to save him from captivity and death. At length, a privateer of St. Malo, hired by his adherents, arrived in Lochnanach, in which he embarked, and arrived at France in safety. While the prince thus led a wandering and solitary life, the scaffolds and the gibbets were bathed with the blood of his adherents; seventeen officers of the rebel army were executed at Kennington Common, in the neighbourhood of London, whose constancy in death gained more proselytes to their cause than perhaps their victories could have done. Nine were executed at Carlisle; six at Brompton; seven at Penrith; and eleven at York. A few obtained pardons; and a considerable number were transported to the plantations. The earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, with the lord Balmerino, were tried by their peers, and found guilty. Cromartie was pardoned; the other two were beheaded on Tower-hill. Kilmarnock, either from conviction, or from the hope of pardon, owned his crime, and declared his repentance of it. On the other hand, Balmerino, who had from his youth up been bred to arms, died in a more daring manner. When his fellow-sufferer, as commanded, exclaimed, "God bless king George," Balmerino still held fast to his principles, and cried out, "God bless king James," and suffered with the utmost intrepidity. Lord Lovat, and Mr. Radcliff, the titular earl of Derwentwater, suffered the same fate with equal resolution.—The flames of war still continued to rage upon the continent with their accustomed violence. The French went forward with rapid success, having reduced almost the whole Netherlands to their obedience. In vain the Dutch negotiated, supplicated, and evaded war; they saw themselves stripped of all those strong towns which defended their dominions from invasion; and they now lay almost defenceless, ready to receive terms from their conquerors. The people, in several towns, inflamed almost to tumult and sedition, compelled their magistrates to declare for the prince of Orange as stadtholder, captain-general, and admiral of the United Provinces. The vigorous consequences of this resolution immediately appeared: all commerce with the French was prohibited; the Dutch army was augmented; and orders were issued to 1747 commence hostilities against the French by sea and land. About this time the English made an unsuccessful expedition into France, in order to attack Port l'Orient, in which they came off without any honour. The French gained a considerable victory at Roucroux, in Flanders, over the allies, although it procured them no real advantage; and it cost them a greater number of lives than those whom they obliged to retire. The Dutch, in this general conflict, seemed the greatest losers. A victory gained over the allies at La Feldt served to reduce them to a still greater degree of distrust of their generals, than they had hitherto shown; but the taking of Bergen-op-Zoom, the strongest fortification of Dutch Brabant, and which put the French in possession of the whole navigation of the Scheldt, threw them almost into despair. But these victories in favour of France were counterbalanced with almost equal disappointments. In Italy, the French general, marshal Belleisle's brother, at the head of 34,000 men, attempted to penetrate into Piedmont; but his troops were put to the rout, and he himself slain. The French king equipped an unsuccessful armament for the recovery of Cape Breton; and, not discouraged by this failure, fitted out two squadrons, one to make a descent upon the British colonies in America, and the other to assist the operations in the East Indies.

1748 These, however, were attacked by Anson and Warren, and nine of their ships were taken. Soon after this, commodore Fox, with six ships of war, took above 40 French ships laden from St. Domingo; and this loss was soon after followed by another defeat, which the French fleet sustained from admiral Hawke, in which seven ships of the line and several frigates were taken. This variety of success served to make all the powers at war heartily desirous of peace. An accommodation was therefore resolved upon: and the contending powers agreed to come to a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, where the earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinson assisted as plenipotentiaries from the king of Great Britain. This treaty, which takes its name from that city, was concluded on the 7th day of October; a lasting instance of precipitate counsels, and English humility. In 1749, a misunderstanding began to break out afresh between his majesty and the prince of Wales, whose servants, with a few independent country gentlemen, now began to form a new opposition in the house of commons. The colony of Nova Scotia was now planted; which, however, neither answered the expectations of the public or its projectors, and which in some measure proved the origin of the war that broke out in 1755. There were great party-riots at this time, particularly at Litchfield races, where the duke of Bedford was grossly assaulted. In 1750, Mr. Pelham planned and executed a scheme for lightening what was then considered the immense load of the national debt. This year the attention of the public was very much engrossed by the Westminster election, in which Lord Trentham and Sir George Vandeput were competitors. The month of February was rendered remarkable by two shocks of an earthquake, that were very sensibly felt in the cities of London and Westminster, and their environs. The month of May was distinguished by a pestilential fever that arose from a contagion among the prisoners tried at the Old Bailey, and which proved fatal to the lord mayor of London, one alderman, two judges, several lawyers, and a considerable number of spectators that attended the session. Disputes first began to arise this year between the courts of England and France respecting the limits of Nova Scotia. On the 20th of March, 1751, Frederic prince of Wales died of a pleuritic disorder, in the 46th year of his age. He was possessed of every amiable quality which could engage the affection of the people: a tender and obliging husband, a fond parent, a kind master, liberal, generous, candid, and humane; a munificent patron of the arts; an unwearied friend to merit; well disposed to assert the rights of mankind in general, and warmly attached to the interest of Great Britain. His royal highness left issue, 1. Augusta, born Aug. 11, 1737, married to the Hereditary Prince of Brunswick, Jan. 16, 1764, and afterwards mother of the late unhappy Queen Caroline, consort of George IV.; died March 23, 1813. 2. His late Majesty George III. born May 24, 1738, old style. 3. Edward duke of York, born March 14, 1739; died Sept. 17, 1767. 4. Elizabeth Caroline, born in Dec. 1740; died Sept. 4, 1759. 5. William Henry, duke of Gloucester, born Nov. 25, 1743; married to the countess of Waldegrave, natural daughter of Sir E. Walpole, K. B.; died Aug. 25, 1805. 6. Henry Frederic, duke of Cumberland, born Nov. 7, 1745, married in Nov. 1771, to Mrs. Horton, a widow, and daughter of lord Irnham; died Sept. 1790. 7. Louisa Anne, born March 8, 1749; since dead. 8. Frederic William, born May 13, 1750; died Dec. 31, 1765. 9. Caroline Matilda, born July 11, 1751, old style; married Oct. 1, 1766, to Christian VII. king of Denmark, from whom she was repudiated in 1772, and died in 1775. The prince of Orange also died in October, in the 41st year of his age. In May, an act passed for changing the style from Old to New, and regulating the commencement of the year, by sinking 11 days in Sept. 1752, and afterwards beginning the year on the 1st of January. The scrutiny relative to lord Trentham and Sir George Vandeput, which had been carried on with great acrimony, terminated, and the former took his seat in parliament. Mr. Crowle, one of Sir George's counsel, was forced to ask pardon on his knees at the bar of the house of commons; which Mr. Murry, brother to lord Elibank, refusing to do, he was committed close prisoner to Newgate. This year, Miss Blandy, for poisoning her father, and Miss Jefferies, with one Swan, for murdering her uncle, were executed. In 1753 passed the two famous bills for naturalizing the Jews, and for preventing clandestine marriages: the former, however, was afterwards repealed. This year too was rendered remarkable by the romantic affair of Elizabeth Canning, a wench who pretended that on New-year's day she had been seized by two men, under Bedlam Wall, who tore off her clothes, gagged her, and carried her to Enfield-Wash; where ('twas wildly affirmed) she had subsisted almost a month on only a quarter loaf. On this occasion one Mary Squires, a gipsy, was tried, and sentenced to die, but afterwards reprieved, to the great joy of all persons of sense and humanity; and Canning being tried for perjury, was transported for life in 1754. The society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, was founded about this time. In 1754, the public of England sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. Pelham, who was succeeded as prime minister by his brother the duke of Newcastle. About this time intelligence arrived which excited the most vivid emotions of grief and compassion amongst all ranks throughout the nation. On the 1st of Nov. 1755, two tremendous shocks of earthquake almost destroyed the city of Lisbon; they continued for near a quarter of an hour, and were immediately followed by a most extraordinary rise and inundation of the Tagus. In the space of a few minutes, a vast number of churches, monasteries, and many thousand private houses, were thrown to the ground. It was computed that ten thousand of the inhabitants were killed by the fall of the buildings, or swallowed up in the chasms formed by the numerous and horrid partings of the earth. The parliament of Great Britain generously voted the sum of 100,000*l.* for the use of the distressed inhabitants of that metropolis. "Amidst the millions expended for the purposes of devastation and destruction," says a modern writer, "a vote of this description seems as a paradise blooming in the wild." The barefaced encroachments of the French, who had built forts on our back settlements in America, and the dispositions they made for sending over vast bodies of veteran troops to support those encroachments, produced a wonderful spirit in England; especially after admiral Boscawen was ordered with 11 ships of the line, besides a frigate and two regiments, to sail to the banks of Newfoundland, where he came up with and took two French men of war, the rest of their fleet escaping up the river St. Lawrence, by the straits of Belleisle. No sooner was it known that hostilities were begun, than the public of England poured their money into the government's loan; and orders were issued for making general reprisals in Europe as well as in America, and that all the French ships, whether outward or homeward bound, should be stopped and brought into British ports. These orders were so effectual, that, before the end of the year 1755, above 300 of the richest French merchant ships, and above 8000 of their best sailors, were brought into British ports. This well-timed measure had such an effect, that the French had neither hands to navigate their merchantmen, nor to man their ships of war; for, about two years after, near 30,000 French seamen were found to be prisoners in England. In July, general Braddock, who had been injudiciously sent from England to attack the French, and reduce the forts on the Ohio, was defeated and killed by falling into an ambuscade of the French and Indians near Fort du Quesne; but major-general Johnson defeated a body of French near Crown Point, of whom he killed about 1000. On the 18th of May, 1756, Great Britain declared war solemnly against France. The English at this time could not be said to have any first minister; some great men agreed in nothing but in opposing the measures of the cabinet. The English navy in 1755 consisted of one ship of 110 guns, five of 100 guns each, thirteen of 90, eight of 80, five of 74, twenty-nine of 70, four of 66, one of 64, thirty-three of 60, three of 54, twenty-eight of 50, four of 44, thirty-five of 40, and forty-two of 20, four sloops of war of 18 guns each, two of 16, eleven of 14, thirteen of 12, and one of ten, besides a great number of bombketches, fire-ships, and tenders; a force sufficient to oppose the united maritime strength of all the powers of Europe; whilst that of the French, even at the end of this year, and including the ships then upon the stocks, amounted to no more than six ships of 80 guns, twenty-one of 74, one of 72, four of 70, thirty-one of 64, two of 60, six of 50, and thirty-two frigates. In proportion as the spirits of the public were elevated by those invincible armaments, they were sunk with an account that the French had landed 11,000 men in Minorca, to attack Fort St. Philip there; that admiral Byng, who had been sent out with a squadron, at least equal to that of the French, had been baffled if not defeated by their admiral Galissionière, and that at last Minorca was surrendered by general Blakeney. The English were far more alarmed than they ought to have been at those events. The loss of Minorca was more shameful, than detrimental to the kingdom; but the public outcry was such, that the king gave up Byng to policy, under the character of public justice, and he was shot at Portsmouth for cowardice. It was about this time that Mr. Pitt was placed, as secretary of state, at the head of the administration. He had been long known to be a bold speaker, and he soon proved himself to be a spirited minister. The miscarriages in the Mediterranean had no consequence but the loss of Fort St. Philip, which was more than repaired by the vast success of the English privateers both in Europe and America. The successes of the English in the East Indies, under colonel Clive, were almost incredible. He defeated Suraja Dowla, nabob of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixia, and placed Jaffier Ally Cawn in the ancient seat of the new nabobs of those provinces. Suraja Dowla, who was in the French interest, was, a few days after his being defeated, taken by the new nabob, Jaffier Ally Cawn's son, and put to death. This event laid the foundation of the present amazing extent of riches and territory which the English now possess in the East Indies. Mr. Pitt introduced into the cabinet a new system of operations against France, than which nothing could be better calculated to restore the spirits of his countrymen, and alarm their enemies. Far from dreading an invasion, he planned an expedition for carrying the arms of England into France itself, and the descent was to be made at Rochfort, under general Sir John Mordaunt, who was to command the land troops. Nothing could be more promising than the dispositions for this expedition. It sailed on the 8th of Sept. 1757, and admiral Hawke brought both the sea and land forces back on the 6th of Oct. to St. Helen's, without the general making an attempt to land on the coast of France. He was tried and acquitted, without the public murmuring; so high an opinion had the people of the minister, who, to do him justice, did not suffer a man or ship belonging to the English army or navy to lie idle. Jan. 6, 1757, the French king was stabbed in his side, as he was getting into his coach, by one Damien, who, though evidently a maniac, was punished with most cruel and exquisite tortures. The French having attacked the electorate of Hanover with a powerful army, merely because his Britannic majesty refused to wink at their encroachments in America, the English parliament, in gratitude, voted large supplies of men and money in defence of the electoral dominions. The duke of Cumberland had been sent thither to command an army of observation; but he had been so powerfully pressed by a superior army, that he found himself obliged to lay down his arms; and the French, under the duke of Richelieu, took possession of that electorate and its capital. At this time a scarcity next to a famine raged in England; and the Hessian troops, who, with the Hanoverians, had been sent to defend the kingdom from an invasion intended by the French, remained still in England. So many difficulties concurring, in 1758, a treaty of mutual defence was agreed to between his majesty and the king of Prussia, in consequence of which the parliament voted 670,000*l.* to his Prussian majesty; and also voted large sums, amounting in the whole to near two millions a year, for the payment of 50,000 of the troops of Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, Saxe-Gotha, Wolfenbuttel, and Buckeburg. This treaty, which proved afterwards very burdensome to England, was intended to unite the protestant interest in Germany. George II. with the consent of his Prussian majesty, pretending that the French had violated the convention concluded between them and the duke of Cumberland, at Closserseven, ordered his Hanoverian subjects to resume their arms, under Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, a Prussian general, who instantly drove them out of Hanover; and the duke of Marlborough, after the English had repeatedly insulted the French coasts, by destroying their stores and shipping at St. Maloes and Cherbourg, marched into Germany, and joined prince Ferdinand with 12,000 British troops, which were afterwards increased to 25,000. A sharp war ensued. The English every where performed wonders, and, according to the accounts in the London Gazette, they were every where victorious; but nothing decisive followed, and the enemy opened every campaign with advantage.

Even the battle of Minden, the most honourable to the victors, perhaps, in the English annals, in which about 7000 English defeated 80,000 French regular troops in fair battle, contributed nothing to the conclusion of the war, or towards weakening the French in Germany. The English bore the expense of the war with cheerfulness, and applauded Mr. Pitt's administration, because their splendid successes in every other part of the globe demonstrated that he was in earnest. Admiral Boscawen and general Amherst, in August 1758, reduced and demolished Louisburg, in North America, which had been restored to the French by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and took five or six French ships of the line. Frontenac and Fort du Quesne, in the same quarter, fell also into the hands of the English: acquisitions that far overbalanced a check which the English received at Ticonderago, and the loss of about 300 of the English guards at St. Cas, as they were returning under general Bligh from the coast of France. The English affairs in the East Indies this year proved equally fortunate. The lords of the admiralty received letters from thence, with an account of Admiral Pocock engaging the French fleet near Fort St. David's March 29, in which engagement a French man of war, called the Bienaimé, of 74 guns, was so much damaged that they ran her on shore; the French had 600 killed and wounded on this occasion, and the English only 29 killed and 89 wounded; that on August 3d following, he engaged the French fleet a second time near Pondicherry; when after a brisk firing of ten minutes, the French bore away with all the sail they could make, and got safe into the road of Pondicherry; the loss of the French in this engagement was 540 killed and wounded, and that of the English only 147; and that, on December 14 following, general Lally, commander of the French army in those parts, marched to besiege Madras, which was defended by the English colonels Lawrence and Draper; and after a brisk cannonade, which lasted till February 16 following, the English having received a reinforcement of 600 men, general Lally thought proper to raise the siege, and retire with precipitation, leaving behind him 40 pieces of cannon. The year 1759 was introduced by the taking of the island of Goree, on the coast of Africa, by commodore Keppel. Three capital expeditions had been planned for this year in America, and all of them proved successful. One of them was against the French islands of the West Indies, where Guadaloupe was reduced. The second expedition was against Quebec, the capital of French Canada. The command was given, by the minister's advice, to general Wolfe, a young officer of a truly military genius. Wolfe was opposed with far superior forces by Montcalm, the best and most successful general the French had. Though the situation of the country which Wolfe was to attack, and the works the French threw up to prevent a descent of the English were deemed impregnable, yet Montcalm never relaxed in vigilance. Wolfe's courage and perseverance, however, surmounting incredible difficulties, he gained the heights of Abraham, near Quebec, where he fought and defeated the French army, but was himself killed; and general Monckton, who was next in command, being wounded, the completion of the French defeat, and the glory of reducing Quebec, was reserved for brigadier-general (afterwards lord viscount) Townsend. General Amherst, who was the first English general on command in America, conducted the third expedition. His orders were to reduce all Canada, and to join the army under general Wolfe on the banks of the river St. Lawrence. This he accomplished; and the French empire in North America became subject to Great Britain. The affairs of the French being now desperate, and their credit ruined, they resolved upon an attempt to retrieve all by an invasion of Great Britain; but on August 18, 1759, admiral Boscawen attacked the Toulon squadron, commanded by M. de la Clue, near the straits of Gibralter, took Le Centaur of 74, Le Temeraire of 74, and Le Modeste of 74 guns, and burnt L'Océan of 80, and Le Redoubtable of 74 guns. The rest of the fleet, consisting of seven ships of the line and three frigates, made their escape in the night. And on November 20, Sir Edward Hawke defeated the Brest fleet, commanded by admiral Conflans, off the island of Dumet, in the Bay of Biscay. The Formidable, a French man of war of 80 guns, was taken; the Thesée of 74, and the Superbe of 70 guns, were sunk; and the Soleil Royal of 80, and the Héros of 74 guns, were burnt. Seven or eight French men of war of the line got up the river Villaine, by throwing their guns overboard; and the rest of the fleet, consisting of five ships of the line and three frigates, escaped in the night. The English lost on this occasion, upon the shoals of the coasts, the Essex of 64, and the Resolution of 74 guns. After this engagement the French gave over all thoughts of their intended invasion of Great Britain. In February 1760, captain Thurot, a French marine adventurer, who had, with three sloops of war, alarmed the coasts of Scotland, and actually made a descent at Carrickfergus in Ireland, was, on his return, met, defeated, and killed, by captain Elliot, the commodore of three ships of inferior force. Every day's gazette added to the accounts of the success of the English, and the utter ruin of the French finances, which that government did not blush publicly to avow. In short, Great Britain now reigned as the sole mistress of the main, and had succeeded in every measure that had been projected for her own safety and advantage. The war in Germany, however, continued still as undecisive as it was expensive, and many in England began to consider it now as foreign to the internal interests of Great Britain. The French again and again shewed dispositions for treating, and the charges of the war, which now amounted to little less than 18,000,000*l.* sterling yearly, inclined the British ministry to listen to their proposals. A negotiation was accordingly entered upon; but it proved abortive, as did many other projects for accommodation. On the 5th of May, earl Ferrers was executed at Tyburn, for the murder of Mr. Johnson his steward; and on the 25th of October 1700, George II. died suddenly, full of years and glory, in the 77th year of his age, and 33d of his reign. By his consort Wilhelmina Caroline, (daughter of John Frederick, margrave of Brandenburg-Anspach,) to whom he was married on September 2, 1705, he had the following issue: 1. Frederick Lewis prince of Wales, &c. born at Hanover, January 20, 1706-7, and died March 20, 1750-1. 2. Ann, born November 2, 1709, married to Charles William, prince of Orange, March 14, 1734, and died January 12, 1759. 3. Amelia Sophia Eleonora, born May 30, 1711, and died October 31, 1786. 4. Elizabeth Caroline, born May 30, 1713, and died December 18, 1728. 5. William Augustus, duke of Cumberland, born April 15, 1721, and died October 31, 1765. 6. Mary, born February 22, 1722-3, married to Charles, prince of Hesse-Cassel, May 8, 1740, and died January 13, 1759. 7. Louisa, born December 27, 1724, and in November 1743, married to the prince royal, afterwards king of Denmark, by whom she was mother to king Christian VII.; she died December 8, 1751. Under George II. Great Britain may be said to have attained her adult age; but she also began to exhibit that disposition for profuse expenditure, which has since proved detrimental to her finances, and to support which measures were resorted to, and have since been pursued, but little suitable to the genius and feelings of a free nation. The powers of the human mind were freely and fully exercised during this reign. Considerable progress was made in the mathematics and astronomy by Saunderson, Bradley, Mac-laurin, Smith, and the two Simpsons. Among the clergy, Sherlock, Hoadley, Secker, Conybeare, and Warburton, Forster and Leland, were equally distinguished for their genius and erudition. Some curious discoveries in anatomy were made by the ingenuity and dexterity of Hunter and Munro; and surgery was brought to great perfection under the auspices of Cheselden and Sharpe. Among the literati, Young still survived, a venerable monument of poetical talent. Thomson, the poet of the Seasons, displayed a luxuriance of genius in describing the beauties of nature. Akenside and Armstrong excelled in didactic poetry. Even the Epopœa did not disdain an English dress, but appeared to advantage in the Leonidas of Glover, and the Epigoniad of Wilkie. The public acknowledged a considerable share of dramatic merit in the tragedies of Young, Mallet, Home, and some other less distinguished authors. The exhibitions of the stage were improved to the most exquisite entertainment, by the talents and management of Garrick, who greatly surpassed all his predecessors of this and perhaps every other nation, in his genius for acting; in the sweetness and variety of his tones; the irresistible magic of his eye; the fire and vivacity of his action; the elegance of attitude; and the whole pathos of expression. That Great Britain was not barren of poets at this period, appears from the detached performances of Johnson, Mason, Gray, the two Whiteheads, and the two Wartons, besides a great number of other bards, who have sported in lyric poetry, and acquired the applause of their fellow citizens. Even the female sex distinguished themselves by their taste and ingenuity. Miss Carter rivalled the celebrated Dacier in learning and critical knowledge; and Mrs. Lennox signalized herself by many successful efforts of genius, both in poetry and in prose. Johnson, inferior to none in philosophy, philology, poetry, and classical learning, stands foremost as an essayist, justly admired for the dignity, strength, and variety of his style, as well as for the agreeable manner in which he investigates the human heart, tracing every interesting emotion, and opening all the sources of morality. England was not defective in other arts that embellish and amuse. Music became a fashionable study, and its professors generally caressed by the public. Among the few natives of England who distinguished themselves by their talents in this art, Green, Howard, Arne, and Boyce, were the most remarkable. The British soil, which had hitherto been barren in the article of painting, now produced some artists of extraordinary merit. Hogarth excelled all the world in exhibiting the scenes of ordinary life in humorous historical designs. Hudson, Reynolds, and Ramsay, distinguished themselves by their superior merit in portraits; a branch that was successfully cultivated by many other English painters. The art of engraving was brought to perfection by Strange, and laudably practised by several other masters; and great improvements were made in mezzotinto, miniature, and enamel. Many fair monuments of sculpture or statuary were raised by Rysbrack, Roubilliac, and Wilton. Architecture, which had been cherished by the elegant taste of Burlington, soon became a favourite study, and many magnificent edifices were reared in different parts of the kingdom.

GEORGE III. eldest son of Frederick, prince of Wales, was proclaimed king of Great Britain, October 26, 1760. The brighter the national glory was at the time of George the Second's death, the more arduous was the province of his successor. Born and bred in England, the young king had no prepossessions but for his native country, and an excellent education gave him true notions of its interest. He knew that neither the finances nor the population of England could long furnish men and money for supplying the necessity of the war, successful as it was; yet he was obliged to continue it, so as to bring it to a successful issue. Having chosen for his first minister the Earl of Bute, whom he had known ever since he began to know himself; almost the first act of his reign, was to convince the public, that the death of his predecessor should not relax the operations of the war. Accordingly, in 1761, the island of Belleisle, on the coast of France, surrendered to his majesty's ships and forces under commodore Keppel and general Hodgson; as did the important fortress of Pondichery, in the East Indies, to colonel Coote and admiral Stevens. The operations against the French West Indies still continued under general Monckton, lord Rollo, and sir James Douglass: and in 1762, the island of Martinico, till then deemed impregnable, with the islands of Grenada, Grenadillas, St. Vincent, and others of less note, were subdued by the British arms with inconceivable rapidity. By this time the celebrated family compact, among all the branches of the Bourbon family, had been concluded, and it was found necessary to declare war against Spain, who, although no principal in the quarrel, had scandalously abused her neutrality in favour of the French. A respectable armament was fitted out under admiral Pocock, having the earl of Albemarle on board to command the land forces; and the vitals of the Spanish monarchy were struck at by the reduction of the Havannah, the strongest and most important fort which his catholic majesty held in the West Indies. The capture of the Hermione, a large Spanish register-ship, bound from Lima to Cadiz, the cargo of which was valued at a million sterling, preceded the birth of the prince of Wales, his present Majesty; and the treasure passed in triumph through Westminster to the Bank the very hour he was born. The loss of the Havannah, with the ships and treasures there taken from the Spaniards, was succeeded by the reduction of Manilla, in the East Indies, by general Draper and admiral Cornish, with the capture of the Trinidad, reckoned worth three millions of dollars. To counteract these dreadful blows given to the family compact, the French and Spaniards opened their last resource, and invaded Portugal, which had been always under the peculiar protection of the British arms. This measure very much embarrassed the British ministry; but the armaments sent over for the defence of Portugal had no great difficulty in checking the progress of the Spaniards. Negotiations for peace were resumed, and the necessity of concluding a pacification was acknowledged by all his majesty's ministers and privy counsellors, excepting two. Many difficulties were surmounted; but the equally useless and expensive war in Germany was continued between the French and English with greater fury than ever. The enemy, however, at last granted such terms as the British ministry thought admissible; a cessation of arms took place in Germany, and in all other quarters; and on the 10th of February, 1763, the definitive treaty of peace between his Britannic majesty, the king of France, and the king of Spain, was concluded at Paris, and acceded to by the king of Portugal. The ratifications were exchanged at Paris on the 10th of March, on the 22d, the peace was solemnly proclaimed at the usual places in Westminster and London; and the treaty having on the 18th been laid before the parliament, it met with the approbation of a majority of both houses. Never was the fortune of any nation higher than that of the British at this period. Besides rich possessions in the East and West Indies, with others on the coast of Africa, all enlarged by a series of extraordinary success, and confirmed by a perpetual treaty, without including Hudson's Bay, Newfoundland, or the other islands of North America, her dominion extended over all that vast continent, which stretches from the mouth of the river St. Lawrence to that of the Mississippi, and from the Atlantic Ocean to the South Sea. But she was not long to enjoy this extent of empire: during the administration of Mr. Grenville, in 1765, a stamp duty imposed on the British colonies in America, laid the foundation of quarrels between the colonies and the mother country, which ended only in a total separation. In the course of the same year, the sovereignty of the Isle of Man was annexed to the crown of England; and, on account of the seizure of Mr. Wilkes's papers, general warrants, granted by secretaries of state, except in cases of high treason, were declared to be illegal. This triumph over the ministry, rendered Mr. Wilkes extremely popular; and "Wilkes and Liberty" was echoed from mouth to mouth throughout the kingdom. In 1768, he was elected to represent the county of Middlesex in parliament; but he was soon afterwards sent to the King's Bench prison, fined, and expelled the house of commons, for publishing No. 45, of the North Briton, which contained some severe animadversions on the king's speech. Mr. Wilkes's imprisonment expired in 1771, when he was chosen one of the sheriffs for London and Middlesex; he was subsequently made an alderman, had his debts paid, served the office of lord mayor in 1775, and ultimately was elected chamberlain of London. In the year 1768, the house of commons committed the lord mayor and alderman Oliver to the Tower, for detaining and holding to bail one of their messengers, who had attempted to execute the speaker's warrant within the city, without the sanction of a magistrate. About the same time, the American colonists took up arms, in consequence of new duties imposed on tea, paper, glass, and other articles. Their first encounter with the British troops was on the 19th of April, 1775, at Concord, in New England, whither general Gage had sent a party to seize some military stores. This was little better than a skirmish, but as the Americans had the advantage it encouraged them to go on; and in the same year they met in congress, and assumed the title of The United and Independent Colonies of North America. Soon after the affair at Concord, the battle of Bunker's Hill took place, in which near 300 of the British officers and soldiers were killed. Hostilities continued with various success, till 1778, when the French entered into an alliance with the United Colonies, and the war assumed a new character. The year 1780 was remarkable for one of the most dreadful riots that ever happened in the city and suburbs of London. An association of Protestant Dissenters, with lord George Gordon at their head, while the nation was involved in real danger, alarmed themselves with fancied apprehensions of popery, and presented a petition signed by 100,000 persons, to repeal an act they had just passed in favour of the Catholics. They proceeded to the house in great order, on the 2d of June, and the president gave in their petition; but, in the course of the day, several lords and commoners were insulted by the mob. In the evening, the mob pulled down the Sardinian, and another Romish chapel. On the evening of the 5th, Lord Mansfield's and several other houses were sacked; and the next day the King's Bench prison, the New Bridewell, the Fleet prison, some popish chapels, and several papists' houses, were destroyed. Fires were seen blazing in every part of the capital, and the lawless mob were exacting contributions from the citizens, while the magistrates, and even the ministry, viewed these scenes of desolation with an inactivity that was astonishing. At length, however, their courage seemed roused, troops were called into London from all quarters, and were stationed in every part of the town. This step effectually checked the progress of the rioters; a great number of them were shot by the military, and others were taken, tried and executed. Lord George Gordon was also tried but acquitted. In 1782, the British affairs in America began to appear desperate, and every one seemed desirous of bringing it to a conclusion, except those who had been the cause of it. In the mean time, admiral Rodney defeated the French fleet under Count de Grasse, in the West Indies; four French ships were taken, one sunk; and a fifth, which had been taken, blew up. Admiral Hood also captured four, and admiral Barrington two ships of war, and ten sail under their convoy. The Count de Grasse was taken, and brought to England; but most of the prizes, with some of the British ships, were lost, in their passage to England, in a violent storm. The Spaniards, who had also engaged on the side of the Americans, took the Bahama Islands, and besieged Gibraltar with vigorous perseverance; till their efforts were rendered ineffectual by the bravery and conduct of general Elliot. He permitted them almost to complete their works on the land side, when he began such a heavy fire of carcasses, hot shot, and shells, that all their batteries were either damaged or destroyed. Soon after, another attack was made by ten floating batteries, built by the Spaniards at an enormous expence; but, by an incessant fire of red-hot balls from the besieged, most of them were set in flames, and great numbers of the men killed and blown up. In 1783, all parties being tired of the war, the provisional articles between England and America were made public; by which his Britannic majesty acknowledged the independence of the United States of North America. From this period to the year 1788, the time passed in political and party contentions, without producing any thing very material. Towards the close of this year, his majesty was seized with a violent attack of that derangement of intellect, which, soon after his accession, had slightly manifested itself, and which at subsequent periods continued to molest him, till at length it totally incapacitated him for his high station. The nation was thrown into general alarm by this calamity, and public prayers were most earnestly offered up to heaven for his recovery. On Sunday the 13th of July, 1788, about nine in the morning, without any eclipse, a dreadful darkness suddenly overspread several parts of France. It was the prelude of such a tempest as is unexampled in the temperate climates of Europe. Wind, rain, hail, and thunder, seemed to contend in impetuosity; but the hail was the great instrument of ruin; and instead of the rich prospects of an early autumn, the face of nature, in the space of an hour, presented the dreary aspect of universal winter. The soil was converted into a morass, the standing corn beaten into the quagmire; the vines broken to pieces, the fruit trees demolished, and unmelted hail lying in heaps like rocks of solid ice. Even the robust forest-trees were unable to withstand the fury of the tempest. The hail was composed of enormous, solid, and angular pieces of ice, some of them weighing from eight to ten ounces. The country people, beaten down in the fields on their way to church, amidst this concussion of the elements, concluded that the last day was arrived; and scarcely attempting to extricate themselves, lay despairing and half suffocated amidst the water and the mud, expecting the immediate dissolution of all things. The storm was irregular in its devastations; for while several rich districts were laid entirely waste, some intermediate portions of country were comparatively little injured. The year 1789 opened with violent debates in both houses of parliament, on the mode of proceeding to business, in order to settle the regency during the unhappy indisposition of the king. This ferment continued till the 3d of Feb. when certain lords were appointed as commissioners to supply the place of the king, till a regent should be appointed. A bill was then brought into the house of commons, and afterwards sent to the lords, for appointing the prince of Wales regent under certain restrictions, which met with violent opposition in both houses. The bill, however, was in its last stage, when, on the 10th of March, his majesty sent a message to parliament, acquainting them with his happy recovery. The universal joy which this happy and unexpected event occasioned, was expressed by illuminations, such as had never been equalled before; and on the 23d April, (St. George's day) which had been set apart as a day of public thanksgiving, the king, with his royal consort, the members of his family and household, his ministers, most of the nobility and members of the house of Commons, went in solemn procession, through the city, to St. Paul's cathedral, to give praises to Almighty God for his Majesty's restoration. In 1790, an armament was prepared to act against Spain, on account of certain hostilities committed by the Spaniards (at Nootka Sound) on the north-western coast of America; but a negociation having taken place, the Spanish court agreed to an indemnification, and peace was re-established upon honourable terms. Another rupture had nearly broken out with Russia, in 1790, which was successfully terminated by negociation. In 1793, Great Britain was made a party in the war against the French Revolutionists; the dangerous principles which they propagated against monarchical and despotic governments; their public execution of Louis XVI. and their forcibly opening the navigation of the Scheldt, were made the ostensible motives for this measure, which his majesty announced in person to his parliament, on the 21st of June. Hostilities had, indeed, been already begun. War against Great Britain and Holland had been decreed, on the 1st Feb. in the French national convention; soon after which the duke of York set out for Holland, to take the command of the British forces destined to act with the allies, and after several hazardous enterprises commenced the siege of Valenciennes, on the 14th June, which surrendered on the 18th July following. The islands of Tobago, St. Pierre and Miquelon, in the West Indies were taken from the French, in the course of the summer. On the 19th of June the Nymph frigate, captain Pelew, of 36 guns, captured the Cleopatra French frigate of equal force, after a desperate action. In the beginning of September the British troops were unfortunate before Dunkirk, and compelled to retreat precipitately with a great loss of men, cannon, and stores. In Aug. Ld. Hood, in conjunction with the Spaniards, took possession by treaty, of the port of Toulon, but in the latter end of Nov. the allies were compelled to evacuate it, after burning ten of the French ships of the line, and doing other damage. On the evening of the 3d of Feb. 1794, a melancholy accident was occasioned at the Haymarket theatre from the great pressure of the crowd at the opening of the doors, by which 8 or 9 persons lost their lives, and 20 or 30 were severely bruised. In this year the islands of Martinico, St. Lucie, and Guadaloupe, were captured by the British commanders in those quarters; but the French recovered Gaudaloupe and some other islands, and committed great depredations on the British settlements on the coast of Africa. These transactions, however, were all eclipsed by the great naval victory of Earl Howe, on the 1st June over the French fleet; and during the public rejoicing for this victory, advices were received from lord Hood of the capture of the island of Corsica. The increased expenditure of government in support of a war, foreign from British interests, and repugnant to the genius of her revolutionary government, had long excited the dissatisfaction of the great body of the nation; and the necessity for a parliamentary reformation became daily more conspicuous. To effect this purpose, an extensive association had been formed, under the title of the "Corresponding Society;" of which the head-quarters were in London, with branches in nearly every town in the kingdom. This association speedily attracted the notice of ministers; and although Mr. Pitt, in his early years, had himself been a member of a society with the same professed object, he scrupled not, now that he was in high official authority, to exercise his power to crush the spirit, which before he had been assiduous to promote. Warrants from the secretary of state were therefore issued against the leading members of the Society; and many of them, including the celebrated John Horne Tooke, were, in the close of the year, tried for treason. Thomas Hardy, the secretary to the Society, standing foremost on the list, was tried and acquitted on the 5th of November, as were also the others on subsequent days. Their acquittal was considered as a triumph by the populace; but the ministry soon afterwards procured the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and many persons who had become obnoxious to them were shut up in prison, without being brought to trial. At this time the allies on the continent were defeated in every quarter, and the duke of York returned to England. On the 14th of March, 1795, an action took place between the English fleet under admiral Hotham, consisting of 14 ships of the line, and the French fleet of about the same number; but the advantage on the part of the English, owing to the stormy state of the weather, was but trifling. A large force, chiefly emigrants, was landed at Quiberon, to aid the royalists; but it was defeated with immense slaughter. On the 16th Sept. the Cape of Good Hope was taken by admiral Elphinstone and General Clarke; but on the 7th of October the English had the mortification to have a number of the homeward-bound Mediterranean fleet, richly laden, taken by a French squadron, with one of the convoy, of 74 guns. On the 29th of this month, as his majesty proceeded to open the session of parliament, he was grossly insulted by the populace with the cry of "Peace—Give us bread—No war—Down with George," &c. Several persons were taken into custody, among whom was Kid Wake, a journeyman printer, who being convicted of hissing, hooting, &c. was sentenced to five years imprisonment in Gloucester gaol, and to stand in the pillory. Soon after this, an act was passed for the preservation of his majesty's person, which was followed by another for preventing seditious meetings and assemblies. On the 22d of October, 1796, lord Malmsbury was sent to Paris, with a professed view to negociation; but the attempt, of which the sincerity was much doubted, proved abortive, and on the 31st intelligence was received of an attempt to invade Ireland by a French fleet of 17 ships of war, which anchored in Bantry Bay; but it did not make the threatened descent. In the beginning of 1797 the British arms under general Abercrombie and admiral Harvey were very successful in the West Indies: and on the 14th of February, a most signal victory was gained by Sir J. Jervis, (afterwards lord St. Vincent) over the Spaniards, who captured two ships of 112 guns, one of 84, and one of 74. Equal honour was done to the British flag by admiral Duncan, on the 11th October, who gained a complete victory over the Dutch fleet under admiral de Winter, and took eleven of their ships. Previous to this latter victory a mutiny had arisen in the British fleet, and continued for some time, to the great distress of the nation and government; but it was quelled at last, and Parker the ring-leader, with many others, were executed. This year 1200 Frenchmen were landed at Fiskard, on the Welsh coast, and were made prisoners. Another attempt at negotiation with the French was made, which proved, like the former, unsuccessful. In the month of August, great disturbances took place in Scotland, particularly at Tranent, in opposition to the balloting for the militia; in quelling which, many lives were lost. On the 19th of December his majesty, attended by both houses of parliament, went in state to St. Paul's, to return thanks for the naval victories obtained over the French, Dutch, and Spanish fleets. Affairs in Ireland were at this time deplorable: faction had long torn that unhappy country, and in the month of May, 1798, a rebellion broke out, which continued to rage for several months; but at last it was suppressed by the king's troops, after many thousands of infatuated creatures had perished. In the month of September about 1000 French troops landed in Ireland, and took possession of the town of Killala; but, after some successes over the king's troops, they were compelled to surrender to general Lake. Another and more powerful attempt was made, by a formidable armament from Brest: but, being attacked and defeated off the coast of Ireland, by the fleet under Sir J. B. Warren, all the hopes of the rebels were completely crushed. This year an expedition of about 1000 men was sent by the English to Ostend, to destroy the gates and sluices of the canal of Bruges. The object was effected, but the assailants were taken prisoners. This misfortune was amply compensated by naval successes in every quarter; but especially by the ever-memorable victory of lord Nelson (Aug. 2.) in the bay of Aboukir, over the French fleet, which had sailed from Toulon in May, with an army of 36,000 men, under general Buonaparte, and had landed them at Alexandria a few days before. The result of this brilliant action was seven ships of 74 guns taken; one of 80, and one of 74, burnt; besides two frigates of 36 guns sunk. Only four of the French fleet escaped. In the beginning of this year, a number of persons were arrested at Margate, on suspicion of treasonable intentions and practices; among whom were Mr. Arthur O'Connor, John Binns, John Alley, James Coigley (alias Morris, alias Favey) and Patrick Leary. After undergoing a trial at Maidstone, they were all acquitted, except Coigley, who was found guilty, and executed on the 6th of June. In 1799, the English power in India was greatly extended by the defeat of Tippoo Saib, who was slain in battle, and his capital was taken. In the latter end of the summer, an invasion of Holland was effected, by the combined English and Russian troops, under the duke of York; but, though at first successful, they found it afterwards expedient to evacuate the country. In the mean time the Dutch fleet fell into the hands of the British, under admiral Mitchell. In the month of October, general Buonaparte returned from Egypt, and having placed himself at the head of the government, soon after made proposals of peace in a letter to the king. This, however, was rejected by the British ministry, who incurred the general displeasure of the country for their conduct. On the 15th of December that great and virtuous man general Washington, the first president of the United States of America, died, in the 68th year of his age, after a short illness of only three days. In the year 1800, a legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland was effected, after strong parliamentary opposition, and was decreed to take effect on the 1st of January, 1801, with the title of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. On the 15th of May, as his majesty entered his box at Drury-lane Theatre, a pistol was fired at him from the pit, by one James Hadfield, who had served under the duke of York; but, after a trial for high-treason, on the 26th of June, he was acquitted, on proof of his insanity. On the 14th of June, the French gained a memorable victory over the Austrians, at the battle of Marengo, in Italy, and on the Rhine were equally successful; which compelled the Austrians to make peace. About this time an expedition, under Sir James Pulteney, landed a body of troops near Ferrol; and having gained complete possession of the heights which command the place, and nothing was expected but a speedy possession of the town and shipping, a re-embarkation was ordered, to the great mortification of the troops, and to the great surprise of the public. In the beginning of 1801, a British force, under general Abercrombie and admiral Keith, sailed to the Mediterranean; and, on the 8th of March, effected a landing at Aboukir, in Egypt, in order to dispossess the French of that country; which was ultimately accomplished, after several sharp engagements, particularly that on the 21st of that month, in which the brave Abercrombie received a mortal wound, of which he died about a week after, the command devolving on general Hutchinson. In the beginning of this year, a confederacy was formed against England, by the Russians, Swedes, and Danes; and an embargo was laid upon all the ships of those nations in British ports. The object of the confederacy was to dictate a new maritime national law, to the prejudice of England. However, on the 12th of March, a fleet sailed from Yarmouth, under Sir Hyde Parker and lord Nelson, for the Baltic; and failing in an attempt to settle the business by negotiation, the latter admiral attacked the Danish fleet in the harbour of Copenhagen, under their batteries; and, after destroying nearly the whole of their ships, compelled them to recede from the confederacy; which Sweden also shortly after agreed to do, without resistance; and the emperor Paul dying suddenly about the same time, an end was put to this once alarming business. In the spring of this year, a change of ministry took place, when Mr. Addington succeeded Mr. Pitt as chancellor of the exchequer. Three French ships of the line, in Algeziras Bay, near Gibraltar, were attacked in the beginning of July, by Sir James Saumarez; but the Hannibal of 74 guns getting aground, was obliged to be abandoned to the enemy: this loss, however, was more than overbalanced in a subsequent attack on the French and Spanish fleets, as they attempted to return to Cadiz; when two of the largest ships in the Spanish navy were burnt, and a French 74 gun ship taken. After this, several attacks were made by a light squadron, under lord Nelson, on the flat-bottomed boats, &c. collected at Boulogne, for the purpose of invading England; but they totally failed in their object, though attended with the loss of many valuable lives. Affairs were in this state when the public were agreeably surprised with the return of peace. On the 1st of October, the welcome news was suddenly announced, of preliminaries of peace having been signed by lord Hawkesbury on the part of his majesty, and citizen Otto for the French republic. The negotiation of the definitive treaty, however, proceeded but slowly; its conclusion became a subject of anxious doubt; and when at length it was signed at Amiens, on the 27th of March, 1802, it was evident that the two governments did not behold each other with sufficient cordiality to ensure a long continuance of peace. About this time, colonel Wall, who had been governor of Goree, on the African coast, was brought to trial at the Old Bailey, on a charge of murder, committed nineteen years before, in his official capacity, by ordering a serjeant to be so severely flogged, without the sanction of a court-martial, that the man died: the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and he was executed on the 28th of January, 1802. Towards the close of the same year, a dangerous conspiracy was said to have been detected and one colonel Despard, a man of broken fortune and deranged mind, with six others of the very lowest description of society, were tried for high treason, found guilty, and executed on the 21st of February. In May, 1803, hostilities recommenced between Great Britain and France. The British ministry, as a preliminary measure, embargoed all French vessels in British harbours; and, by way of reprisal, Buonaparte, first consul of France, made all British visitors and residents in his dominions prisoners of war. By this measure hundreds of individuals were ruined, and numerous families were driven to great distress. The West Indian islands, St. Lucie and Tobago, were taken by the British in June; and soon afterwards the French took possession of Hanover. In July of this year, an insurrection took place in Dublin, and Lord Kilwarden was dragged from his carriage as he passed through the streets, and murdered by the infuriated mob. In the months of February and March, 1804, his majesty experienced a return of his former mental indisposition; but it happily subsided in a few weeks. On the 20th of May, Napoleon Buonaparte was proclaimed Emperor of the French; and on the 2d December he was crowned in that capacity at Paris, by the Pope. In 1805, Austria and Russia were induced to engage in the war; but they experienced only reverses. Napoleon drove their armies before him, entered Vienna on the 14th November, overthrew their united force, at Austerlitz, on the 2d December, and obliged Austria to conclude a separate peace on the 27th. On the 22d of July, in the same year, admiral Calder engaged the combined fleets of France and Spain, and took from them two ships of the line: but as this success was not deemed commensurate with his advantages and means, he was brought before a court-martial for neglect of duty, and sentenced to be dismissed the service. His failure was amply compensated by Lord Nelson on the 21st October, when he engaged the united naval force of France and Spain, off Cape Trafalgar, and destroyed or took 19 sail of the line, and made the French admiral and two Spanish admirals prisoners. Unhappily his lordship was killed in the engagement, to the great regret of the British nation. His remains were brought over to England; and a day of fasting and humiliation was set apart for his funeral, on the 9th Jan. 1806, when they were conducted in solemn pomp to St. Paul's cathedral, and deposited in the vault beneath. By the battle of Trafalgar, the French and Spanish navies were ruined; only four ships of the line, belonging to the former, escaped the general destruction; and these were fallen in with and taken by Sir R. Strachan, on the 3d of Nov. in the same year. On the 23d Jan. 1806, died Mr. Wm. Pitt, in his 47th year, who had long held the reins of administration, with the exception of the short time during which he resigned them to Mr. Addington, for the purpose of concluding the peace of Amiens. By his death, the ministry was dissolved, and in the new arrangements, Mr. Fox and his friends were included with the Grenville party. The new administration, however, did not hold together long; Mr. Fox died in September following; and the late friends of Mr. Pitt again came into office. The successes of the Emperor Napoleon were such, that by the close of the year 1807, nearly all the powers of the continent had submitted to him, and declared against Great Britain, whose commerce and finances had become the grand objects of his hostility. At the commencement of the war, he had threatened a descent on the English coast; and had collected a large army in the neighbourhood of Boulogne, and provided a numerous flotilla to transport it over. But the simultaneous arming of the British, as volunteers, in every county, district, town, and almost in every village, together with the more regular preparations for his reception, deterred him from making the attempt; and he adopted measures for ruining the country which he despaired of conquering. In all the countries, over which he had influence, British property was sedulously sought after, confiscated, and destroyed; and its farther importation was prohibited by the most penal decrees. On the 10th January 1806, the Cape of Good Hope, which had been restored to the Dutch, by the peace, was retaken by Admiral Sir Home Popham and General Sir David Baird. From Africa, Sir Home proceeded to South America, and there, on the 28th June, he made himself master of Buenos Ayres; though not having a sufficient force for its defence, he lost it again on the 12th July, after sustaining the assaults of the Spaniards for three days. On the 3d Feb. 1807, Gen. Auchmuty took possession of the town and citadel of Montevideo: but this also proved but a temporary conquest; for in July, Major-general Whitelock, after being repulsed in an attack upon Buenos Ayres, signed a convention for the evacuation of all South America. Early in 1807, Sir J. T. Duckworth conducted his fleet up the Dardanelles, with a view to force the Porte from the interest of France; but his expedition proved unsuccessful. About the same time, a British armament was sent to Egypt, but failed in its object of separating that country from the dominion of the Grand Signor. The Danish government had not yet declared against Great Britain; but it was evident that it could not long maintain its neutrality. It had a numerous fleet in harbour; and to frustrate Napoleon's design of getting it into his possession, the British ministry sent Admiral Gambier with a well appointed force to seize and bring it away, by treaty if possible, otherwise by force. The British were permitted to land on the island of Zealand without opposition; but the proposal for surrendering the fleet was disdainfully rejected by the Danish government. The consequence was, that Copenhagen was bombarded for three days; and when it was on the point of being taken by assault, a convention was proposed and agreed to, on the 6th September, by which the Danish fleet, consisting of 17 ships of the line, 12 frigates, and numerous smaller vessels, with all the naval stores in the arsenal, were surrendered to Great Britain; but to be returned at the conclusion of the war. About the same time, a French army entered Portugal, which had remained in the interest of Great Britain, and the Prince Regent and court of Lisbon, to avoid falling into their hands, were conveyed in British vessels to the Brazils, on the 29th Nov. This was the commencement of the Peninsular war, in which the British army repeatedly encountered and defeated the veteran troops, with which Napoleon had subjugated nearly the rest of Europe. The defeat of the French by Sir Arthur Wellesley (Duke of Wellington) on the 21st Aug. 1807, was followed by the convention of Cintra, on the 30th, by which they were obliged to evacuate the Portuguese territory. In the mean time General Moore had penetrated into the interior of Spain; but in consequence of the union of the French forces, he was obliged to retreat towards the close of the year. Being overtaken near Corunna, an action took place on the 16th Jan. 1809, in which General Moore was killed and Sir D. Baird wounded; although they succeeded in effecting the re-embarkation of their troops. In July, Sir Arthur Wellesley, advancing from Lisbon, met the French at Talavera, and gave them a repulse on the 21st; but a few days afterwards he retired, and the rest of the year passed without any operations of consequence in that quarter. In the latter end of July, an expedition of 100,000 land and sea forces, under the Earl of Chatham, was sent to the coast of Holland: Flushing surrendered to them on the 15th, and its basin was destroyed; but with this trifling exception the expedition proved abortive; the troops mostly perished by the unwholesome air of Walcheren;

and in December the survivors returned dejected and degraded. On the 25th of October his majesty entered the 50th year of his reign, and the day was observed as a general festival, with illuminations, bonfires, fireworks, and other demonstrations of joy at night. On the 17th Sept. 1810, Sir Arthur Wellesley defeated the French Marshal Massena at Busaco, and was rewarded with a peerage. From this time the war in Spain was prosecuted with vigour and success, till in the autumn of 1813, the French were driven out of the country, and Lord Wellington, on the 7th October, led his victorious army over the Pyrenées into France. We come now to the concluding scene of the political life of George III. the distressing illness of his youngest daughter the Princess Amelia, who died on the 2d Nov. 1810, proved too much for his weakened intellects; his mental disorder returned upon him with aggravated symptoms, and issued at length in downright imbecility. The parliament met agreeably to its last adjournment, but without summons, on the 1st of November; his majesty's indisposition was announced by ministers; physicians were examined, and adjournments took place, to see what turn the disorder would take: but as no amendment appeared, on the 22d of December the Commons resolved to pass a bill for appointing the Prince of Wales Regent, and he took the oaths in that capacity on the 8th of February, 1811. From this period George III., confined to Windsor Castle, was no more publicly heard of, except in the occasional announcement in the Regent's speeches, that his disorder continued, till the time of his death, which took place on the 29th Jan. 1820, in the 60th year of his reign, and 82d of his age. Great and many were his virtues, and they endeared him to his people; under his government the nation attained the pinnacle of glory; but it also reached the climax of taxation. George III. was born 4th June, 1738, ascended the British throne 25th Oct. 1760, and was married 8th Sept. 1761, to the Princess Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, born 19th May, 1744, crowned with him 22d Sept. 1761, died 17th Nov. 1818, aged 75; by whom he had issue: 1. George Frederick Augustus, Prince of Wales, (his present majesty George IV.) born 12th Aug. 1762; married 8th Apr. 1795, to his first cousin Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, daughter of Charles, Duke of Brunswick, born 17th May, 1768, died 7th Aug. 1821; by whom he had issue, Charlotte Carolina Augusta, born 7th Jan. 1796, married 2d May, 1816, to Prince Leopold George Frederick of Saxe Cobourg; died 6th Nov. 1817.—2. Frederick, Duke of York, and Bishop of Osnaburg, born 16th Aug. 1763; married 29th Sept. 1791, to Frederica Charlotte Ulrica Catharine Augusta, eldest daughter of the King of Prussia, born 7th May, 1767, died 6th Aug. 1820.—3. William Henry, Duke of Clarence, born 21st Aug. 1765; married 11th July, 1818, to Princess Adelaide Amelia Louisa, of Saxe Meiningen, born 13th Aug. 1792.—4. Charlotte Augusta Matilda, Princess Royal, born 29th Sept. 1766; married 18th May, 1797, to Frederick Charles William, hereditary Prince, and afterwards King of Würtemberg, born in 1754, died 30th Oct. 1816.—5. Edward, Duke of Kent, born 2d Nov. 1767, died 23d Jan. 1820; married 20th May, 1818, to the Princess Victoria Maria Louisa, sister to Prince Leopold of Cobourg, and Princess Dowager of Leiningen, born 17th of August 1786, by whom he has left Alexandrina Victoria, born 24th of May, 1819.—6. Sophia Augusta, born 8th of November, 1768.—7. Elizabeth, born 22d of May, 1770; married 7th Apr. 1818, to Prince Philip Augustus Frederick, of Hesse Homberg.—8. Ernest Augustus, Duke of Cumberland, born 5th of June, 1771; married 29th May, 1815, to Frederica Sophia Carolina, daughter of the Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, born 20th March, 1778.—9. Augustus Frederick, Duke of Sussex, born 27th Jan. 1773; married in November, 1793, at Rome, to Lady Augusta Murray, daughter of the Earl of Dunmore, but the marriage was annulled in August 1794.—10. Adolphus Frederick, Duke of Cambridge, born 24th Feb. 1774; married 7th May, 1818, to Princess Augusta Wilhelmina Louisa, of Hesse, born 25th July, 1797, by whom he has issue, George Frederick Alexander, born 26th March, 1819.—11. Mary, born 25th April, 1776; married 22d July, 1816, to her cousin Frederick William, Duke of Gloucester, born 15th Jan. 1776.—12. Sophia, born 3d Nov. 1777.—13. Octavius, born 23d Feb. 1779; died 3d May, 1783.—14. Alfred, born 22d Sept. 1780; died 20th Aug. 1782.—15. Amelia, born 7th Aug. 1783; died 24th Nov. 1810.

GEORGE IV. King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King of Hanover, &c. and eldest son of George III. was born on the 12th of August, 1762; received the office of Regent on the 8th Feb. 1811, succeeded his father as King on the 29th Jan. 1820, and was crowned on the 19th July, 1821. His early associates, while Prince of Wales, were Fox, Sheridan, and other leading characters of the Whig party; and it was generally expected, that on assuming the reins of government, he would have selected his ministers from that interest. The nation has, however, been disappointed in finding him, both as Regent and King, retain a Tory administration. The history of his regency, presents a brilliant succession of victories, gained by the British army in Spain, and in the South of France, and in the Netherlands, under the Duke of Wellington, Sir Thomas Graham, and their colleagues; for particulars of which the reader is referred to the Chronology at the end of this work. The overthrow of Napoleon's empire, and the restoration of the Bourbons to the government of France, in 1814, was in a great degree the result of those victories; and after the conclusion of a general pacification, his Royal Highness was visited in London by the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, with a numerous suite of foreign princes, nobles, and warriors. During the same period the navy also maintained its former high character in various detached encounters with the ships of the North American United States, during a state of hostility relative to the right of search. No general engagement, however, took place; nor had either party much to boast of on the score of superiority; and the warfare was happily put an end to by a negotiation, carried on at Ghent, where a pacific treaty was signed between the two powers on the 24th Dec. 1814. The domestic history of this prince, which has furnished matter of regret to the whole nation, embraces topics too extensively ramified to be more than hinted at in the contracted space of this article. Suffice it to say, that soon after the birth of the Princess Charlotte, the prince and his consort were separated, and the latter became an object of unrelenting animosity till death put a period to her sufferings on the 8th Aug. 1821. Her remains were hurried out of the kingdom, and deposited in the family vault at Brunswick, on the 24th of the same month. The Princess Charlotte, the issue of this unhappy marriage, had attained her 20th year, when she was married to Prince Leopold, of Saxe Cobourg, on the 2d May, 1816, with every prospect of matrimonial felicity; and the nation looked up to her as the heir-apparent to the crown, with the fondest expectations. An unexpected blow was however given to the public mind and feeling by her sudden death, on the 6th Nov. 1817, a few hours after she had given birth to a still-born male child.

GEO'RGIA, called by the Persians Gurgistan, and by the Turks Gurtshi, a province of Asia, partly belonging to Persia, and partly to the Turks. It comprehends the ancient Iberia, and is bounded on the N. by Circassia, on the S. by Turcomania and Erivan, on the E. by Schirvan and Daghestan, and by the Black Sea on the W. The inhabitants, who are very fair, and whose women are accounted the most beautiful in the world, are a sort of Christians; but their doctrines greatly differ from those which are taught by other sects. In disposition they are mild, but extremely ignorant, and addicted to sensual pleasure.

GEO'RGIA, one of the United States of North America, 290 miles long and 230 broad, is bounded on the E. by the Atlantic Ocean; on the S. by Florida; on the W. by the territory of Alabama; and on the N. by S. Carolina and Tennessee. It contained, in 1821, 340,989 souls, and is divided into 40 counties. The whole coast is bordered with islands, which, like the continent, being well wooded, the channel between them is extremely pleasant. The principal rivers are the Savannah, Ogeechee, Alatamaha, St. Mary, &c. The winters in Georgia are mild and pleasant, ice and snow being seldom seen. The soil varies according to situation, and different degrees of improvement. By culture are produced rice, indigo, cotton, silk, Indian corn, tobacco, potatoes, oranges, figs, pomegranates, &c. Louisville has superseded Augusta as the capital.

GEO'RGIA, SOUTH, the principal of a cluster of islands in the South Atlantic Ocean, discovered by Captain Cook, in 1775, and so named by him. It is 64 miles long, and its greatest breadth is about 30. It abounds in bays and harbours, which the ice renders inaccessible the greatest part of the year. The valleys were covered with snow, and the only vegetation observed, was a bladed grass growing in tufts, wild burnet, and a plant like moss. Not a stream of fresh water was seen on the whole coast. These islands lie between 53. 57. and 54. 57. S. lat. and between 35. 34. and 38. 13. W. lon.

GEO'RGIC, s. [γεωργικόν, Gr.] some part of the science of husbandry put into a pleasing poetical dress.

GEO'RGIIUM SIDUS, also called Herschel, probably the most remote planet from the sun, was discovered by Dr. Herschel in 1781. It has six satellites, is about 90 times bigger than the earth, and moves round its orbit in about 30,445 days 18 hours, at the immense distance of about 1800 millions of miles from the sun.

GERMAIN, ST. a town of Cornwall, formerly a bishop's see, with a small market on Friday. It was once the largest town in the county, and still sends two members to parliament. What is left of the cathedral is used as the parish church; and near it is the priory, yet standing. It is 228 miles W. by S. of London.

GERMAN, s. [germanus, Lat.] a brother; one approaching to a brother in nearness of blood; applied to the children of brothers and sisters, who are called cousins german.

GERMANDER, s. [germandrie, Fr.] a plant, called also groundpine; likewise a kind of speedwell.

GE'RMANY, a country of Europe, bounded on the W. by Switzerland, France, the Netherlands, and the German Ocean; on the N. by Sleswick and the Baltic Sea; on the E. by Prussia, Poland, and Hungary; on the S. by Hungary, the Adriatic, Italy, and Switzerland; being about 640 miles in length, and 550 in breadth. The air is temperate and wholesome, and the productions are various. Germany contains many sovereign princes, secular and ecclesiastic, who are independent of each other; and there were a number of free imperial cities, which were so many little republics, governed by their own laws; these altogether constituted a great confederacy, governed by general laws, under a sovereign who bore the title of emperor; whose power in the collective body, or diet, was only executive. The emperor nevertheless possessed many prerogatives, once of a very extensive nature, but restricted in later years. His dignity was elective, and he possessed it for life. The electors were the princes, the lords, and the deputies of cities, till the year 1239, when their number was reduced to seven: one more was added in 1649, a ninth in 1692, and a tenth in 1798; at which time they consisted of the archbishop of Ratisbon, the king of Bohemia (archduke of Austria,) the duke of Bavaria, the duke of Saxony, the duke of Brandenburg (king of Prussia,) the duke of Hanover (king of Great Britain,) the duke of Wurtzburg, the duke of Würtemberg, the grand duke of Baden, and the prince of Hesse. These all bore the title of Electors, and their territories were denominated Electorates. Each elector bore the title of one of the principal officers of the empire; the elector of Hanover, for instance, being "arch-treasurer and elector of the holy Roman empire." To prevent the calamities of a contested election, a king of the Romans was often chosen in the life-time of the emperor, on whose death he succeeded to the imperial dignity, as a circumstance of course. The supreme authority resided in the diets, which consisted of three colleges; that of the electors, that of the princes, and that of the imperial towns. When that of the electors and that of the princes disagreed that of the towns could not decide the difference; though they were obliged to give their consent, when the other two were of one opinion. The diets had the power of making peace or war, of settling general impositions, and of regulating all the important affairs of the empire; though their decisions had not the force of law till sanctioned by the emperor's consent. All the sovereigns of Germany had absolute authority in their own dominions to raise taxes, levy troops, make alliances, &c. provided they did not prejudice the general interests of the empire. They determined all causes definitively, except in some particular cases in which an appeal might be made to two courts, called the Imperial Chamber and the Aulic Council. Germany was divided into 9 circles, each of which comprehended several states; the princes, prelates, and counts of which, with the deputies of the imperial towns, met together about their common affairs. Each circle had one or two directors, and a colonel; the directors had a power of convoking the assembly of the states of their circles, and the colonel commanded the army. This constitution was gradually dissolved, after Napoleon had assumed the imperial title in France, and extended his influence into Germany. He advanced the dukes of Saxony, Bavaria, and Würtemberg to the dignity of kings, formed a kingdom in Westphalia, in favour of his brother Jerome, and constituted a new confederacy, called the Confederation of the Rhine, of which he declared himself the head, under the title of Protector, and into which he drew the newly made kings, with the grand duke of Baden and several other princes and states. The ancient imperial dignity being thus reduced to an empty title, Francis II. the reigning emperor, formally renounced it on the 6th Aug. 1806, and assumed the title of Hereditary Emperor of Austria. On the overthrow of Napoleon's empire in 1814, the Confederation of the Rhine was dissolved, as was also the Westphalian kingdom; and many of the petty states were restored to their former owners; though the ancient constitution was not revived; Francis still bears the title of Emperor of Austria, which is hereditary in his family, the kings of Saxony, Würtemberg, and Bavaria, retain their regal dignities, and Hanover has been erected into an hereditary kingdom, in favour of its former sovereign the king of Great Britain. For maintaining the external and internal security of Germany, a new confederacy, bearing the title of the Germanic Confederation, was settled by a congress of the princes, &c. held at Vienna, in 1815, by which its affairs were confided to a federative diet of 17 individual and collective estates, which holds its sessions at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and of which Austria has the presidency. The language of Germany is a dialect of the Teutonic, which succeeded that called the Celtic. The three principal religious professions are the Romish, Lutheran, and Calvinistic. The first prevails in the dominions of the emperor, in the ecclesiastical states, and in Bavaria; the second in the circles of Upper and Lower Saxony, a great part of Westphalia, Franconia, Suabia, the Upper Rhine, and in most of the imperial towns; the third in the dominions of the king of Prussia, the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, and of some other princes.

GIBRA'LTAR, a town of Andalusia, in Spain, near a mountain of the same name, formerly called Calpe, which, with Mount Abyla, or Ape's Hill, as it is called by sailors, on the opposite shore of Africa, were called the Pillars of Hercules. It was formerly thought to be impregnable; but, in 1704, it was taken by Sir George Rook. The French and Spaniards attempted to retake it the same year, and 400 or 500 of them crept up the rock which covers the town, in the night-time, but were driven down headlong the next morning. In 1727, the Spaniards besieged it again, and attempted to blow up the rock; which they found impracticable. In the course of the American war, the Spaniards besieged it, from July, 1779, to February, 1783; but their ever-memorable attack, on September 13, 1782, with floating batteries of 212 brass cannon, &c. in ships from 1400 to 600 tons burden, ended in the destruction of all the ships, with most of the assailants in them. The garrison here are cooped up in a very narrow compass, and, in time of war, have no provisions but what are brought from Barbary and England. The fortress is now so strong by art and nature, as probably to bid defiance to the utmost efforts of an enemy: upwards of 300 pieces of cannon are mounted on the works. The town of Gibraltar, which contains several streets, one pretty spacious and well paved, the others narrow and dirty, has three gates, and is built at the foot of a barren rock, or craggy hill, which rises about 1400 feet above the level of the sea, in a peninsula, which can be approached only by a narrow passage, between the mountain and the sea. Across this isthmus the Spaniards have drawn a fortified line, to prevent the garrison from having any communication with the country. The English here, exclusive of the garrison, amount to about 2000; and the Spaniards, Portuguese, Genoese, and Jews, to as many more. Here is one English and one Spanish church, and a Jew's synagogue. The road is not safe against storms, nor convenient for refitting vessels; the harbour is formed by two moles, one of which is 300 feet in length. On the summit of the rock is a plain, which affords a fine prospect of the sea on each side the Strait, as also of Barbary, Fez, and Morocco, in Africa, and of Seville and Granada, in Spain. The Strait of Gibraltar is about 24 miles in length, and 15 in breadth, and a strong current always runs through it from the ocean to the Mediterranean. Gibraltar is 25 miles N. of Ceuta, and 60 S. E. of Cadiz. Lat. 36. 6. N. lon. 5. 20. W.

GLA'CIAL, a. [glacialis, Lat.] icy; made of ice; frozen.

To GLA'CIATE, v. n. to turn into ice.

GLACIA'TION, s. [from glacies, Lat.] ice; the act of turning into ice.

GLACI'ERS, a name given to some extensive fields of ice in Switzerland. The Glaciers may be divided into two sorts; the Lower, occupying the deep valleys, situated in the bottom of the Alps, and termed by the natives, Valley of Ice; and the Upper, which clothe the summits and sides of the mountains. The Lower Glaciers are the most considerable in extent and depth, some stretching several leagues in length. At the higher extremity, they are bordered by inaccessible rocks, and on the other extend into cultivated valleys. The thickness of the ice varies from 80 to 100 feet, and in some parts extends to upwards of 600 feet. These immense fields of ice usually rest on an inclined plain; being pushed forward by the pressure of their own weight, and but weakly supported by the rugged rocks beneath, they are intersected by large transverse chasms, and present the appearance of walls, pyramids, and other fantastic shapes, observed at all heights and at all situations, wherever the declivity exceeds 30 or 40 degrees. But in those parts, where the plain on which they rest is nearly horizontal, the surface of the ice is passable, being not so slippery as that of the frozen ponds, or rivers, but rough and granulated, and only dangerous in deep descents.

GLA'CIS, s. [Fr.] in Fortification, a sloping bank. It is more especially taken for that which ranges from the parapet of the covered way to the level on the side of the field.

GLAD, a. [glæd, Sax.] cheerful; gay; pleased; or pleasing; rejoicing at some good which has happened. Figuratively, whatever appears fertile, bright, or showy.

To GLAD'DEN, v. a. to cheer; to exhilarate; to affect with a sensation of pleasure or delight.

GLADE, s. [from glod, Dan.] a lawn or opening in a wood; a passage through a wood made by lopping off the branches of trees, which may be open or shady.

GLADIATOR, s. [Lat.] a person who used to fight with a naked sword in the public shows at Rome. Figuratively, a prize-fighter, pugilist, fencer, or sword-player.

GLADIOLE, s. the flowering rush.

GLADLY, ad. in a joyful manner; with exultation.

GLADNESS, s. a sensation of joy or delight, arising at the prospect of success, or the actual possession of good.

GLADSOME, a. delighted; pleased; causing joy.

GLADSOMELY, ad. with delight or pleasure.

GLADSOMENESS, s. gaiety; a slight sensation of joy.

GLADWYN, s. a provincial term for the stinking flag.

GLAIR, s. [glair, Fr.] the white of an egg.

To GLAIR, v. a. [glairer, Fr.] to varnish or smear with the white of an egg, used by bookbinders.

GLAMORGANSHIRE, a county of South Wales, bounded on the N. by Carmarthenshire and Brecknockshire, on the E. by Monmouthshire, and on the S. and W. by the Bristol Channel. It extends from E. to W. 48 miles, and 26 from N. to S. It is divided into 10 hundreds, which contain 1 city, 5 market towns, 125 parishes, and 101,737 inhabitants; and sends two members to parliament. On the N. side of this county, where it is mountainous, the long continuance of the snow renders the air sharp; but being more level on the S. side, it is there milder, more pleasant, more populous, and bears large crops of corn, with remarkably sweet grass. Cattle abound in all parts, there being fruitful vallies among the mountains, that yield very good pasture. Here are also lead, coal, iron, and lime-stone. Its principal rivers are the Rumney, which separates it from Monmouthshire, the Taafe, Elwy, Neath, Ogmore, Avon, Cledaugh, and Tawy. Cardiff is the principal town, and Swansea the most commercial one; but the assizes for the county are held at Cowbridge.

GLANCE, s. [glantz, Teut.] a sudden shoot or beam of light or splendour; a stroke or dart of light; a hasty look.

To GLANCE, v. n. [glantzen, Teut.] to shoot a sudden ray of light or splendour; to fly off, or to strike in a sloping manner. Used with at, to hint at, or censure a person's faults by some oblique hints. Used with eye, to take a quick, slight, or transient view; to view obliquely.

GLANCINGLY, ad. in an oblique manner; transiently.

GLANDERS, s. in Farriery, a running of corrupt matter from the nose, differing in colour, according to the degree of malignity, being white, yellow, green, or black.

GLANDFORD BRIDGE, or Brigg, a town of Lincolnshire, with a large manufacture of skins, and a considerable trade in corn, coals, and timber. It is seated on the Ancholme, or Ancam, 23 miles N. of Lincoln, and 156 N. by W. of London. Market on Thursday.

GLANDIFEROUS, a. [from glans and fero, Lat.] bearing acorns, mast, or fruit like acorns.

GLANDULE, s. [glandula, Lat.] in Anatomy, a small gland; sometimes applied, in the plural, to signify what are vulgarly called the almonds of the ear.

GLANDULOSITY, s. a collection of glands.

GLANDULOUS, a. [glandulosus, Lat.] pertaining to, situate in, or having the nature of, glands.

To GLARE, v. n. [glaren, Belg.] to shine so as to dazzle the eyes; to look fiercely; to shine ostentatiously.

GLARE, s. an overpowering or dazzling lustre; a fierce, piercing look; ostentatious show.

GLAREOUS, a. [glareosus, Lat.] consisting of a viscous and transparent matter like the white of an egg.

GLARING, [part. of glare] flagrant; notorious; enormous, applied to any very great crime.

GLARIS, or Glarus, a canton of Switzerland, entirely surrounded by the Alps, except towards the N. where an opening between the mountains and the lake of Wallenstadt affords the only entrance to the canton. It has the river Linth on the N. the canton of Schweitz on the W. the Grisons on the E. and the same with Uri on the S. It is a cold mountainous country, yet affording cattle, cheese, butter, and a prodigious variety of uncommon plants, minerals, metals, crystals, medicinal springs, petrifications, and large slates. The Protestants and Romanists live together here in great harmony, amicably fill together the offices of government, and successively make use of the same house for public worship. The population amounts to about 20,000 souls. The capital, of the same name, lies in Lat. 46. 55. N. lon. 9. 7. E.

GLASGOW, a city of Scotland, in the county of Lanark, on the north bank of the Clyde, over which it has two stone bridges. Its extent, and the beauty and regularity of its buildings, entitle it to the rank of the second city in the kingdom: the streets are clean and well paved; and several of them, intersecting each other at right angles, produce a very agreeable effect. The four principal streets divide the city nearly into four equal parts; and the different views of them, from the centre of intersection, have an air of magnificence. Here are a few magnificent public buildings, and several charitable establishments, particularly the Merchants' Hospital, and that of the town. Here is a celebrated university; the single college belonging to which is an elegant and commodious building. The number of inhabited houses in it is upwards of 11,000, and it contains about 101,000 inhabitants, including the population of the suburbs. A considerable trade was formerly carried on here in tobacco and rum, but it has been lately on the decline. The cotton manufactures rival those of Manchester in cheapness and elegance; and a pottery is likewise carried on here, that emulates, in beauty and elegance, the Staffordshire ware. Printing types are well executed here, and the glass manufactory has been very successful. Here are also manufactures of coarse earthenware, hats, stockings, gloves, ropes, cordage, &c. Glasgow has the advantage of two canals, besides the Great Canal that joins the Clyde to the Forth. The Clyde, has been made navigable, for vessels drawing 7 feet 6 inches water, as far as the bridge; but larger vessels stop to unload at Port-Glasgow, or at Greenock. It is 10 miles S. W. of Dumbarton, 43 W. by S. of Edinburgh, and 402 from London. Lat. 55. 52. N. lon. 4. 18. W.

GLASS, s. [glas, Sax.] an artificial substance, made by fusing or melting fixed salts, flint, and sand together, with a vehement fire, transparent to the sight, ductile when hot, but not malleable. A glass vessel of any kind, particularly a cup with a foot, to drink of out; hence, figuratively, it is used for that quantity of liquor which such a vessel contains, as, a glass of wine. A glass, to view one's face in, called a looking-glass; a perspective-glass, or telescope, to view distant objects with; a glass made use of for measuring time, by means of sand, which runs through a small aperture, and called an hour-glass; an instrument for shewing the weight, &c. of the air, called a weather-glass.

GLASSY, a. resembling glass in smoothness, lustre, or brightness; vitreous; made of glass.

GLASTONBURY, a pretty, large, and well-built town of Somersetshire, principally consisting of two streets, in both of which are many houses, either entirely built, or patched up, with stones from its abbey, formerly the most magnificent in the world, the domains and revenue of which were immense. It was anciently called Avalonia, or the Isle of Avalon, into which no person whatever, not even a bishop or prince, was allowed to enter, without leave from the abbot, to whom this power was granted by Canute the Dane. There were 61 abbots, who sat among the barons in parliament, and governed it successively for near 600 years. Richard Withing, the last abbot, was hanged on the top of the Tor, a high hill in the neighbourhood, for refusing to surrender his abbey to Henry VIII. and to acknowledge his supremacy. Extensive ruins of this immense range of buildings are still remaining; and the curious structure, called the Abbot's Kitchen, is yet entire, as also some fragments of the church, and St. Joseph's chapel. The walls that remain are overgrown with ivy; and the aspect of the whole is at once melancholy and venerable. The principal manufacture here is stockings. Nearly adjoining, on a high steep hill, is placed St. Michael's tower, the Tor above mentioned, which is an object of admiration to travellers, and serves as a mark to seamen in the Bristol Channel. Glastonbury is situated in a low marshy country, nearly encompassed with rivers, 6 miles S. W. of Wells, and 124 W. by S. of London. Market on Tuesday. H. Hunt, esq. is lord of the manor.

GLASTONBURY THORN, s. a species of medlar, which produces some bunches of flowers about Christmas, and blossoms again in the spring. The monks of Glastonbury had many superstitious stories relative to this thorn.

GLOUCESTER, a city and the capital of Gloucestershire, with a market on Wednesday, and fairs on April 5, July 5, September 28, and November 28, the latter chiefly for fat hogs. It is well built, and contains five parish churches, besides its ancient and magnificent cathedral, five hospitals, two free-schools, and a county gaol. Its four principal streets are greatly admired for the regularity of their junction in the centre of the town; besides which there are several smaller streets, all well paved. Here is a good stone bridge over the Severn, and the lowest down that river, with a quay, wharf, and custom-house. Ships can come up the Severn to the bridge, but on account of the circuitous and difficult navigation, a canal has been made to Berkeley, at the head of which is a bason fit for the reception of 100 vessels. In the suburbs is a saline spring, with a handsome pump-room, elegant gardens, and lodging-houses. Gloucester, which sends two members to parliament, has a flourishing manufacture of pins, and is seated on the E. side of the Severn, where, by its two streams, it forms the Isle of Alney, 34 miles N. E. by N. of Bristol, and 104 W. by N. of London. Inhabitants 9771.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE, a county of England, bounded on the W. by Monmouthshire and Herefordshire; on the N. by Worcestershire; on the E. by Warwickshire and Oxfordshire; and on the S. by Wiltshire and Somersetshire. It extends from N. E. to S. W. more than 60 miles, but is not more than 26 in breadth. It is divided into 28 hundreds, which contain two cities, 25 market-towns, 338 parishes, 1229 villages, about 50,000 houses, and 335,843 inhabitants. The soil and appearance of this county vary in different parts, but the air is healthy throughout; sharp on the E. or hilly part, which contains the Coteswold Hills, but mild in the rich Vale of Severn, which occupies the centre. The W. part, which is the smallest district, is varied by hill and dale, and chiefly occupied by the Forest of Dean, which was once full of oak trees, but the iron works have consumed a great part of them. The staple commodities are cheese, cider, perry, bacon, grain, and fish, besides its manufactures of woollen cloths, hats, leather, paper, bar-iron, edge tools, nails, brass, &c. Its rivers are the Severn, the Warwickshire or Upper Avon, the Lower Avon, the Wye, Thames, Coln, Lech, Windrush, Evenlode, Churn, Leden, Swiliate, Caron, and Stour.

To GNAR, or GNARL, nar, or narl, v. n. [gnyrran, Sax.] to growl, murmur, snarl, or grind the teeth.

GNARLED, a. knotty.

To GNASH, nash, v. n. [knaschen, Belg.] to strike or clash together, applied to the teeth, either on account of rage, or from a sensation of excessive cold or agony.

GNAT, nat, s. [gnat, Sax.] a small winged insect, or fly, of which there are, according to Derham, at least 40 distinct species. In this vermicular state, it is a red maggot, and has a mouth and other parts accommodated to food; in its aurelia state, it has no such parts, because it subsists without food; but in its mature (gnat) state, its mouth is furnished with a curious well-made spear, to suck out the blood of other animals. Any thing proverbially small.

GNATFLOWER, s. a plant; the same as the bee-flower.

GNATSNAPPER, s. a bird so called because he lives by catching gnats.

To GNAW, naw, v. a. [gnagan, Sax.] to bite and tear off by means of the teeth; to eat or chew by degrees; to bite in agony and rage. To fret, waste, or corrode.

GRA'VESEND, a town of Kent, consisting chiefly of one street, paved and lighted. It is a place of considerable resort, being a common landing-place for seamen and strangers in their passage to London. It is commonly called the corporation of Gravesend and Milton, these two places having been incorporated by Queen Elizabeth. In the reign of Richard II. the French and Spaniards came up the Thames, burnt and plundered it, and carried away most of the people; and, by way of compensation for this loss, he granted the remaining inhabitants the exclusive privilege of carrying passengers between this place and London, in large and commodious boats, at two-pence a head, or a whole boat's fare at four shillings. They still enjoy this privilege; but the fare is now 1s. 6d. a head, and the boats are much improved. For its better security, Henry VIII. raised a blockhouse, with a platform of guns, to the E. of the town. The gardens round the town are so rich, that they not only supply the shipping, and all the towns for several miles round, with every article of that kind, but great quantities, and particularly of asparagus, remarkably fine, are sent to London. The chief employment of the labouring people is the spinning of hemp to make nets for fishing, and ropes. It is situated on the Thames, directly opposite to Tilbury Fort, 9 miles W. N. W. of Rochester, and 22 S. by E. of London. Market on Wednesday and Saturday; and a fish-market on Sunday morning.

GRE'CISM, s. [græcismus, Lat.] a construction, idiom, or expression, peculiar to the Greek language.

GREECE, a country of Europe, of great celebrity in ancient history, as the seat of the arts, science, and commerce; and equally renowned for its prowess in war; but now subject to the Turks, who call it Roumelia. It is bounded on the N. by Bulgaria, Servia, and Dalmatia; on the W. by the Gulf of Venice; on the S. by the Mediterranean; and on the E. by the Archipelago, the sea of Marmora, the Black sea, and the straits of the Dardanelles and of Constantinople; comprehending the provinces of Macedonia, Albania, Livadia, the Morea, the island of Candia, and the isles of the Archipelago. It enjoys a temperate air, is healthy, and has a fruitful soil. The Greeks profess Christianity, according to that peculiar form and creed, which are distinguished by the title of "the Greek church;" but the Turks, to whom they are subject, and who are the most numerous, are Mohammedans, and have long made the Christians groan under their tyranny. The consequence has been mutinous discontent on one hand, and increased severity on the other. Frequent insurrections have broken out; but the most important one took place towards the end of the year 1820, and is still (in 1822) in operation. The professed object of the Greeks is the recovery of their civil and religious liberty; they have called upon the princes and states of Christendom for assistance; but have hitherto obtained only promises, and a negociation on the part of Russia with the Porte on their behalf.

GREECE, (corrupted from degrees) s. a flight of steps. Obsolete.

GREEDILY, ad. [grædelice, Sax.] in an eager, hasty, or ravenous manner; with keen appetite; voraciously.

GREEN, a. [grun, Teut. groen, Belg.] having a colour like that of grass; in compositions of dying and painting, made by mixing blue or black and yellow together. Flourishing; fresh; undecayed. New or lately made; as "A green wound." Unripe; immature; young, alluding to fruits being green before they are ripe. Not roasted; half raw. Not dry. Pale; sickly.

GREEN, s. the colour of grass, or that which resembles it. In Optics, it is one of the original, simple, or primary rays of light; but in dying is caused by compounding blue and yellow, &c. As this colour rather refreshes than impairs the sight, the goodness of Providence is manifest in causing it to be reflected from the surface of vegetables, preferably to any other. Figuratively, a plain covered with grass. The leaves of trees and vegetables, opposed to their flowers. In Cookery, used in the plural for those plants which are of this colour, and eaten boiled.

GREENCLOTH, s. a board or court of justice, held in the counting-house of the king's household, for taking cognizance of all matters of government and justice within the king's court royal, and for correcting all the servants that offend. It takes its name from a green cloth spread over the board where they sit. None of the king's servants can be arrested for debt, without a warrant first obtained from this board.

GREENEYED, a. having eyes coloured with green; applied to the passion of jealousy, in a figurative sense.

GREENFINCH, s. a kind of bird.

GREENGAGE, s. a species of plum.

GREENISH, a. somewhat green; tending to green.

GREENLAND, a country, including some islands, situated between the straits of Davis and Forbisher, and Iceland. The northern limits are as yet unknown. West Greenland seems to be the most N. E. part of America. East Greenland lies in a high latitude, N. of the continent of Europe, as does also Spitzbergen, which is sometimes comprehended under the general name of Greenland. The seas on the coast are annually visited by a great number of ships of the English and other European nations, for the purpose of fishing for whales. The most southerly point of land in West Greenland, is Cape Farewell, at the entrance of Davis's Straits, in lat. 59. 38. N. and lon. 44. 42. W. The Greenlanders are strangers to trade, arts, and sciences. They are generally short, or under the common size, but well proportioned, fat, and plump. Their clothing is made of the skins of the rein-deer, the dog-fish, and of certain birds, sewed together with the small guts of the canus marinus. It is very seldom that they are afflicted with epidemical diseases, but the scurvy is the reigning disemper in this country; their common remedy on this occasion, besides other simples, is scurvy-grass. Both sexes live together in a very sordid, filthy manner, in two sorts of habitations, one of which serves for the winter, and the other for the summer season. Their winter dwellings are large huts, seldom more than two ells above the surface of the ground; the roof is covered with turf, and the entrance is dug narrow and winding under ground. These wintry mansions are extremely warm, but stink intolerably, from the number of persons generally confined in them. Their summer habitations are light tents, made of the smooth skins of the dog-fish. The occupation of the men is chiefly fishing and hunting, for which they have very curious tackle and instruments. The boats, in which the men only row out to sea, are made of very thin narrow boards, fastened together with whalebone, and covered with seal-skins. Only one man goes out in one of these boats, and he is half covered, and so securely laced in, that the water cannot penetrate into the boat; thus equipped, he will row 60 or 70 miles in a day, though he has but one oar, which is 6 or 7 feet long, and flat at both ends. Their chief commodities are blubber and whalebone, the horn of the sea-unicorn, and the skins of deer, foxes, and the dog-fish. They neither use nor have any knowledge of money, but they fix a certain value on iron. The original inhabitants, on the first arrival of the Norwegians, in 1023, were savages, apparently of American extraction. Since the middle of the last century, the Danes have settled several colonies along the coast, and at present claim the sovereignty of the country. There is a company established at Copenhagen, which sends three or four ships every year to Greenland. The animals are deer, white bears, foxes, wild fowls; and, in the water, whales and seals.

GREENLY, ad. with a greenish colour; newly; freely; immaturity; wanly; timidly.

GREENNESS, s. the quality of being green; viridity; immaturity; unripeness; freshness; vigour; newness; also rawness, unskilfulness, or imperfection in trade, art, science, &c.

GREENOCK, a sea-port town in the county of Renfrew, situated at the mouth of the Clyde, 24 miles W. by N. of Glasgow. It has a considerable foreign trade, and a share in the herring fishery. Here is a sugar-house, and a rope and sail manufactory. Inhabitants about 20,000. Lat. 55. 54. N. lon. 4. 29. W.

GRISONS, a people inhabiting a district of the Alps, called by the ancients Upper Rhætia, and formerly divided into three leagues, denominated the Caddée, or League of God's House, formed in 1419, against the secular power of the bishop; the Grise, or Gray League, in 1424; and the League of the Ten Jurisdictions, in 1436; these, however, were so far united, as to form one republic, yet retaining their peculiar constitutions, laws, and customs. A diet, or assembly of the three leagues, was held every year, at the towns of Ilantz, Coire, and Davos, alternately, and consisted of sixty-three deputies, and three chiefs. In the election of these deputies, every male of sixteen years of age had a voice. But in 1798, this constitution was changed by the French, and the country is now an additional canton of Switzerland. The country does not produce grain sufficient for half the inhabitants, whose principal object is the care of their sheep and cattle. It is about 87 miles in length, and is bounded on the N. and E. by the Tyrolese; on the S. by Venice and Milan; and on the W. by the cantons of Glaris, Uri, and Tessin. The inhabitants, about 74,000 in number, are partly of the Church of Rome, and partly Protestants. Coire, or Chur, is the capital.

GUADALOUPE, one of the Leeward Caribbee Islands in the West Indies, between Antigua and Dominica. It is about 250 miles in circumference, and is divided into two parts by a channel, in one place 4 miles over, yet navigable only for canoes, called Salt River. By this strait, the sea on the N. W. communicates with that on the S. E. The N. W. part is divided into Basseterre and Cabesterre. The S. E. part is named Grandeterre; it does not, however, contain more land than the former, but its shape is more irregular. The soil is exceedingly good, and every where well watered, especially in the district of Cabesterre. On the top of a very lofty mountain, is a volcano, called La Souffrière, the two mouths of which open into a pit of sulphur. The negroes get brimstone here, which they afterwards purify and sell. The vegetables, fruits, and trees, are much the same as in the other islands. The bees are without stings; and their honey never hardens, but is always of the consistence of oil. In 1775, the exports were 188,886 quintals of sugar, 63,029 of coffee, 1438 of indigo, 1024 of cacao, and 5193 of cotton; besides hides, and other articles. This island, during the last war, was taken by the English; but was restored to France by the treaty of Paris, in 1814. Basseterre, the capital, is in lon. 61. 49. W. lat. 15. 59. N.

It is divided into Lower and Upper. The Lower part is commonly called Congo. The Upper comprehends the districts of Sierra Leone; the Grain Coast, or Malaguetta; the Tooth Coast; the Gold Coast; the Slave Coast; and Benin. It is unhealthy for Europeans, though the natives live to a considerable age. The latter in general go almost naked; and are said to be an innocent, inoffensive, and hospitable people, except such as have been corrupted by the Europeans. The British, Dutch, Portuguese, Danes, and French, have factories on the coast, where they carry on an extensive trade in elephants' teeth, gold dust, rice, and maize, tropical fruits, gums, hard woods, wax, and slaves. The latter object of traffic, which commenced in 1517, was abandoned by the British in 1807, who have since formed establishments for promoting the civilization of the natives.

GUI'NEA, NEW, or PAPUA, a long, narrow island, of the South Pacific Ocean, N. of New Holland, from which it is separated by Endeavour Strait. This strait is about ten leagues long and five broad, except at the N. E. entrance, where it is contracted by a group of Islands, called the Prince of Wales's Islands. New Guinea extends from near the equator to 12 deg. S. lat. and from 131 to 153 deg. E. lon. The land is in general low, and covered with an astonishing luxuriance of wood and herbage. Most of the trees, shrubs, and plants, common in the South Sea Islands, are found here in the greatest perfection. The inhabitants resemble the New Hollanders.

H.

H Is the eighth letter, and sixth consonant, in our alphabet. Some Grammarians indeed will have it to be only an aspiration or breathing; but it is most certainly a distinct sound, and formed in a peculiar manner by the organs of speech, at least in our language. It is pronounced by a strong expiration of the breath between the lips, closing, as it were, by a gentle motion of the lower jaw to the upper, and the tongue nearly approaching the palate. That it is a distinct letter, appears from the word eat and heat, arm and harm, ear and hear, ell and hell, as pronounced with or without the h. In English, it is scarcely ever mute in the beginning of a word, as hour, or where it precedes a vowel, as inhabit; when followed by a consonant, it has no sound, as in sight; when it has c before it, it is sometimes dropped, c being pronounced hard, like a k, as in Christ, which the Saxons wrote Crist, and in echo; but this does not hold good always, for it is pronounced in charity, church, &c. Whenever it follows p, it is sounded together with it like an f; as Philip, &c. Among the ancients it was a numeral letter, signifying 200; and when with a mark over it thus H̄, 2000. In abbreviatures, it is used for homo, as J. H. S. Jesus Hominum Salvator, i. e. Jesus the Saviour of Mankind.

HA, interj. [Lat.] an expression of wonder or surprise; a sudden question, equivalent to What? When repeated, an expression of laughter or joy.

HAMBURGH, a free city, and one of the largest towns in Germany, the births and burials amounting to about 5000 persons every year. It consists of the Old and New Town; both of nearly equal size. Most of the houses are new, built after the manner of the Dutch, and richly furnished within. The principal streets of the Old Town have long and broad canals, which are filled twice every 24 hours by the tides. These are not only useful for trade, but serve to keep the houses and the streets clean. On the ramparts are handsome walks, on which the inhabitants take the air in fine weather. The burghers, divided into several companies, mount guard themselves. The streets are well lighted every night, and there is a guard which patrols all over the city. In time of peace, it is a place of great trade, with Portugal, Spain, France, England, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Italy, and Russia; but is not remarkable for manufactures. The senate of this town, which acknowledges no superior jurisdiction, is composed of thirty-six persons. The town is divided into five parishes, and in each are several colleges, or companies, for the superintendence of public affairs, unless there be any thing too high for their determination, and then it is judged by a sort of general assembly. The inhabitants are all Lutherans, and no foreigners, except the English, have the liberty of performing divine service in a chapel of their own. It is advantageously situated on the north bank of the Elbe, 45 miles N. W. of Lunenburgh, 60 S. of Sleswick, and 55 N. E. of Bremen. Lon. 10. 1. E. lat. 53. 33. N. This city suffered much from the French during the revolutionary wars; but was restored to independence in 1814.

HA'NOVER, a country of Germany, in the circles of Lower Saxony and Westphalia, and comprehending the duchies of Zell, Saxe-Lunenburgh, Bremen, and Lunenburgh, the principalities of Calenburgh, Verden, Grubenhagen, Hoyer, Oberwald, Diepholtz, Bentheim, &c. It is well situated for foreign trade, lying mostly between the rivers Weser and Elbe; and produces timber, cattle, hogs, mum, beer, minerals, quicksilver, vitriol, and brimstone. Hanover, originally a duchy, was raised to the rank of an electorate in 1692, and continued subject to the king of Great Britain till 1803, when it was overrun by the French, and soon afterwards added to the kingdom of Westphalia; but on the overthrow of Napoleon's empire, Hanover was restored to his Britannic majesty. In 1815, the duchy of Lunenburgh was ceded to Denmark, and some small territories to Prussia. The remaining states, with the accession of the principalities of Hildesheim, East Friesland, Lower Munster, and the city and territory of Goslar, now constitute the kingdom of Hanover, which is governed by the Duke of Cambridge, in quality of viceroy, for his brother King George IV. of Great Britain and Ireland. At the beginning of the late war, this country was taken by the French, but restored by the treaty of Paris, 1814.

HA'NOVER, a well-built populous town of Calenburgh, in Lower Saxony, capital of the kingdom of the same name, and the seat of the privy-council and viceroy. It contains the palace (which having been destroyed by fire, was rebuilt, in 1741, with great magnificence,) the state-house, a very grand structure, 3 parish churches, 3 hospitals, a poor-house, and about 1200 houses, some of which are very large and handsome buildings, with about 15,700 inhabitants. Here are some valuable manufactures of lace, stuffs, stockings, ribbons, &c. and a considerable trade in the tanneries, and brewing a species of white beer. It is situated on the river Leine, (which divides it into two parts) 58 miles S. E. of Bremen, and 140 W. of Berlin. Lat. 52. 22. N. lon. 9. 48. E.

HANS-TOWNS, or Hanseatic Union, a name given to a confederacy of several sea-ports of Europe, which engrossed, at the time, the principal part of the commerce of Europe. This association extended from the North Seas and the Baltic, along the whole coast of Europe, to Messina in the Mediterranean, and included cities of Poland, Norway, Germany, Holland, England, France, Spain, Portugal, and the different states of Italy. The design of this association was, at first, the common defence of its members against the pirates, who were numerous in the North Seas and the Baltic; and for a time they were much encouraged by the different governments of Europe, and had considerable privileges granted them. In the year 1200, there were seventy-two cities in the list of Hans-Towns; and so powerful was this alliance, that its ships were often hired by different princes to assist them against their enemies; at length it grew so formidable, particularly from the 14th to the 16th century; as to give umbrage to several princes, who commanded the cities within their jurisdiction to withdraw from the union; and the secession of those of England, France, Spain, and Italy, immediately followed. The union itself on the other hand, excluded several others, and put themselves under the protection of the Empire, making a decree that no cities should be admitted into their society, except such as stood within the limits of the German empire. The confederacy was afterwards farther reduced, till at length it comprised only Bremen, Lubeck, Hamburg, and Dantzic, each of which carried on a separate trade for itself; and it was finally dissolved by the conquests of the French revolutionists.

HARDICANUTE, was at Bruges with his mother, when Harold died, consulting about measures to recover the crown of Wessex; and upon the news of his brother's death, he came over into England with 40 Danish ships, and was unanimously acknowledged king of England. Immediately after he was crowned, he caused the body of his brother to be dug up, and thrown into the Thames, which being found by some fishermen, they gave it to the Danes, who deposited it in their burial-place at London, at this day called St. Clement's Danes. Soon after, he laid a heavy tax on the nation for paying his fleet, which he sent back to Denmark. This occasioned great murmuring and discontent among the people. At Worcester the tax was opposed with the utmost violence, and two of the persons employed to collect it were killed: this so enraged the king, that he sent the dukes of Wessex and Mercia, and the earl of Northumberland, with their forces, against Worcester; who, after plundering the city for four days, burnt it to the ground. Hardicanute, who was infamous for gluttony and drunkenness, as well as for cruelty, died suddenly as he was carousing at the wedding of a Danish lord, at Lambeth. He died unlamented by all; and the English, we are told, kept the day of his death, June 8, as a holiday for some centuries after, by the name of Hoc-tide, or Hog's-tide. He died in 1041, in the 3d year of his reign; and with him ended the monarchy of the Danes in England, after it had lasted about 26 years, but after they had harassed the kingdom 240 years. In these times we are told, that a Dane would often stab an Englishman as he was drinking, so that at length no one would drink in the presence of a Dane, without having somebody to be his pledge or security; whence, it is said, our custom of pledging one another took its rise.

HARL, s. [heorda, Sax.] the filaments or threads of flax; any substance consisting of threads or filaments.

HARLECH, or HARLEIGH, a mean town of Merionethshire, but naturally strong, being seated on a rock, on the sea-shore. It is chiefly remarkable for its castle, built by Edward I. which is still almost entire. Near it is a cataract of the Rhais Du, which rushes down a mountain, for above 100 yards, and then forms a cascade, part of an elliptical curve, to a pool 40 feet below. Harlech is the county town, and is 26 miles S. E. of Carnarvon, and 231 W. N. W. of London. Market on Saturday.

HARLEM, a large, rich, and handsome town, of the Netherlands, in S. Holland, containing 40,000 inhabitants. It is noted for its church, the largest in Holland, in which is a remarkably fine organ, containing 8000 pipes, the largest 38 feet long, and 16 inches in diameter, and 68 stops, of which the most wonderful is the vox humana. To the S. of the town is a wood, cut into delightful walks and vistas. Here are considerable manufactures in linen, ribbands, and tapes; and an extensive exportation of beer. It is situated on the river Sparen, about a league from the sea, and 12 miles W. of Amsterdam. Lat. 52. 22. N. lon. 4. 37. E.

HARLEQUIN, s. [derivation uncertain] a person dressed in a motley-coloured jacket and trowsers; the hero in pantomime entertainments, who diverts the populace by his activity, artifices to extricate himself from danger, and his seeming power in enchantments and metamorphoses.

HARLESTON, a town of Norfolk, with a large market on Wednesday, seated on the river Wavenay, over which there is a bridge. It is 16 miles S. E. of Norwich, and 99 N. E. of London.

HARLING, a town of Norfolk, with a market on Tuesday, chiefly for linen yarn and linen cloth. It is seated on a rivulet; and is a pretty neat, genteel town, but has no church, and only a small chapel in the middle of the place, and a Presbyterian meeting-house. It has one wide street, and manufactures a little linen cloth. It is 89 miles N. E. of London.

HARLOT, s. [herlodes, Brit.] an unchaste female; a strumpet.

HARLOTRY, s. an habitual practice of unchasteness, applied to a woman. A term of contempt for a woman. Fornication. Ribaldry. Any thing meretricious.

HARLOW, a town of Essex, chiefly noted for its annual fair, on a common, about 2 miles from the town, much frequented for horses, hogs, and cows, on Sept. 9. It is called Harlow Bush Fair. It has another fair on Nov. 8. Harlow is situated on the W. side of the Rodings, about 17 miles W. of Chelmsford, and 23 N. E. of London.

HARM, s. [hearm, Sax.] an action by which another person may receive damage in his goods, or hurt in his person; mischief; hurt, or injury. SYNON. Harm particularly relates to any ill done a man's person or character, and is inferior in degree to hurt, which includes a great degree of harm. Mischief implies ill done either to person or property with an evil intent; injury, a degree of hurt without justice, and refers either to character or property. Detriment includes an idea of loss, and is seldom used but when speaking of property.

To HARM, v. a. to damage the goods or fortune of another, or to hurt his person.

HARMA'TTAN, s. the name of a remarkable periodical wind, which blows from the interior parts of Africa towards the Atlantic ocean. It is attended with fog, extreme dryness, and yet great salubrity.

HARMFUL, a. hurtful; injurious; detrimental; mischievous; noxious; pernicious.

HARMFULLY, ad. in such a manner as to produce mischief, hurt, or damage; injuriously; perniciously.

HARMFULNESS, s. the quality which renders a thing or person detrimental to the interest, hurtful to the person, or injurious to the character, of another.

HARMLESS, a. without hurt; without intending or causing any mischief; without being damaged; innocent.

HARMLESSLY, ad. innocently; without malice or crime.

HARMLESSNESS, s. the quality of a thing or person which can affect another with no damage or hurt.

HARMONIC, or HARMONICAL, a. [ἁρμονικός, Gr.] proportioned or adapted to each other; musical.

HARMONICA, s. a musical instrument invented by Dr. Franklin, in which the music is performed by glasses, filled with water according to the tone to be produced; but machinery has since been added, to produce the effect in the manner of an organ.

HARMONICS, s. that part of music which considers the differences and proportions of sounds with respect to acute and grave; in contradistinction to rythmica and metrica.

HARMONIOUS, a. [harmonieux, Fr.] adapted to, or having the parts proportioned to, each other. In Music, having sounds that are concords to each other; musical, or affecting the ear with an agreeable sensation.

HARMONIOUSLY, ad. with a just proportion of parts to each other; in such a manner as to delight the ear.

HARMONIOUSNESS, s. that quality which renders sounds agreeable and delightful; proportion of parts.

To HARMONIZE, v. n. to agree with respect to proportion. Actively, to make musical, or convey delight to the ear, applied to sound.

HARMONY, s. [ἁρμονία, Gr.] in Music, is the agreeable result or union of several musical sounds heard at one and the same time; or the mixture of divers sounds, which together have an effect agreeable to the ear. Harmony likewise denotes an agreement, suitableness, union, conformity, &c. Thus, in Music, we sometimes apply it to a single voice, when sonorous, clear, and soft; to a single instrument, when it yields a very agreeable sound. In matters of Literature, we use it for a certain agreement between the several parts of a discourse. In Architecture, it denotes an agreeable relation between the parts of a building. In Painting, they speak of it both in the ordonnance and composition, and in the colours of a picture: in the ordonnance, it signifies the union or connection between the figures, with respect to the subject of the piece; in the colours, it denotes the union or agreeable mixture of different colours.

HARNESS, s. [harnois, Fr.] in its primary sense, armour for a horse; the traces by which horses are fastened to carriages of pleasure or state: that of other horses is called geer.

To HARNESS, v. a. to dress in armour; to fix horses in their traces; or to put traces on a horse.

HAROLD I. surnamed Harefoot, the son of Canute, king of England, ascended the throne upon the death of his father, being supported by the Danes, who were resolved to stand by Canute's will, by which he had left the kingdom of England to Harold. He immediately seized upon the treasure which his father had laid up at Winchester. This enabled him to gain over several of his opposers; and, at a general assembly of the whole nation, held in Mercia, viz. at Oxford, having got a majority of voices, he was proclaimed king of England, Hardicanute being then in Denmark. In the mean time the West Saxons returning home, dissatisfied with his choice, Hardicanute was, by the management of earl Goodwin, proclaimed king of Wessex, without any further interfering with what had been done in Mercia. By Wessex we are to understand all the country south of the Thames, and by Mercia all north of it. In Hardicanute's absence, Goodwin managed all in Wessex. Harold, seeing he could not obtain his end by force of arms, endeavoured to bring him over by fair means, and so managed his matters, that Goodwin on a sudden became his friend; and, under pretence that Hardicanute neglected to come into England, got Harold to be acknowledged king of Wessex with all the ease imaginable; and now he was in reality king of all England. He died without issue, 1039, in the 4th year of his reign. He laid a tax of 8 marks on every port, towards fitting out 16 ships; and made a law, that if any Welshman, coming into England without leave, should be taken on this side Offa's ditch, his right hand should be cut off.

HAROLD II. son of earl Goodwin, succeeded Edward the Confessor, 1065, and had all the qualifications requisite to the forming a great prince. He lessened the taxes, and caused justice to be impartially administered. The duke of Normandy having long entertained thoughts of succeeding to the crown of England upon Edward's death, being moved thereto either by the verbal promise or will of that prince, but much more by his own ambition, was enraged that Harold had, contrary to his oath, set himself up for king. But Harold now met with great uneasiness from his brother Tostig, who was endeavouring to dethrone him; and, being assisted by the earl of Flanders, greatly infested the English coasts. However, an army being sent against him, he was obliged to return to his ships, and was driven on the coasts of Norway, and there met with what he desired. He persuaded Harfagar, king of Norway, to join with him, and they entered the Tyne with 500 ships, landed and ravaged the country, and took York. Harold came up with them at Stamford bridge on the Derwent. They were posted on the other side of the bridge, so that Harold could not come at them without first making himself master of the bridge, which the Norwegians bravely defended, being encouraged by one man, who alone defended the bridge for no small time against the whole English army; but at last, he being slain, after he had, as it is said, killed 40 men with his own hands, Harold became master of the bridge, and led his army over: and now a very obstinate and bloody battle was fought between two numerous armies, no less than 60,000 of a side, which lasted from seven in the morning to three in the afternoon; and at length Harold gained a complete victory, Harfagar and Toston being both slain. But Harold, whether to ease the people of expence, or for whatever reason it was, kept the spoils to himself; which raised such discontent in the army, as proved detrimental to his affairs afterwards. William, duke of Normandy, had, soon after Edward's death, sent ambassadors to Harold, requiring him to deliver up the crown, and, in case of refusal, to charge him with a breach of his oath, and to declare war against him. Harold returned for answer, that the duke had no right to the crown, that the oath was extorted from him, was therefore null and void, and that he would defend his own right against all opposers. The duke of Normandy got the pope's approbation of his design, who sent him a consecrated banner, with a golden Agnus Dei, and one of St. Peter's hairs. Harold had equipped a large fleet, and raised a numerous army, which, after waiting a great while for the duke, he had given orders for the disbanding, just before he heard of Harfagar and Toston's invasion. The duke landed at Pevensey, in Sussex, Sept. 29, 1066, and built a fort there; and then marched along the shore as far as Hastings, where he built another strong fort, and waited for the coming of the enemy. Harold was still in the north, not expecting their coming till the spring; but as soon as he was informed of their arrival, he marched with the utmost expedition to London, where the nobility came in to him, promising their assistance; but he found his army much diminished by the losses at Stamford bridge, and multitudes deserting through discontent. However, having drawn all his forces together, he marched, and encamped about seven miles from the Norman army, resolving to give them battle. The English spent the night in singing and carousing, as if sure of the victory; and the Normans in preparing for the fight, and praying to God for success. On Oct. 17, the two armies engaged; the battle began with great fury and equal bravery on both sides. The English were at first very much annoyed by the long bows of the Normans, a way of fighting they had not been used to, which put them in some disorder; but recovering themselves, they so warmly engaged the Normans, that they were forced to give back a little, who, renewing the attack, met with as vigorous a resistance as before, the English having much the advantage of them with their bills, which were their ancient weapons; nor was it in the power of the Normans to break their ranks, which remained impenetrable till the duke thought of a stratagem, which was, for his men to retreat as they were fighting, as if they were about to fly. This emboldened the English to press upon their retreating enemy, and in their eagerness they broke their ranks; and then the Normans fell on the disordered English, and made a terrible slaughter of them. However, Harold rallied his troops, and the English killed great numbers of the Normans, and preserved their ranks. The battle had lasted from seven in the morning, and night now drew on, whilst victory yet seemed to remain in suspense. But the duke had a mind to make one push more before it was dark, to drive the English from their station. In this fatal attack Harold was slain by an arrow shot into his brain; at which the English being quite dismayed, betook themselves to flight, and the Normans obtained a complete victory. Thus fell the brave Harold in his country's cause, after a turbulent reign of 9 months and 9 days; and with him totally ended the empire of the Anglo-Saxons in England, which had begun in the person of Hengist above 600 years before.

HARP, s. [hearp, Sax.] a musical instrument strung with wire, and struck with the finger; a lyre. In Astronomy, the name of a constellation.

To HARP, v. n. [harper, Fr.] to play on the harp. Figuratively, to touch any particular passion; to dwell on a subject, or refer to it with tedious repetitions.

HARPER, s. a player on the harp.

HARPING-IRON, or HARPOON, s. [harpago, Lat.] a bearded dart, with a line fastened to the handle, with which whales or other large fish are caught.

HARPONEER, or HARPOONEER, s. [harponeur, Fr.] he who darts or throws the harpoon in whale-fishing.

HARPINGS, s. in a Ship, properly denote the breadth at the bow. Some also give the same name to the ends of the bends that are fastened into the stern.

HARPSICORD, s. [harpechorde, old Fr.] a musical stringed instrument, played after the manner of an organ. It has one or two sets of keys, which being fingered, move a jack, by which means the strings are struck, which are stretched on the table of the instrument.

HARPY, s. [plural harpies; harpyia, Lat.] a poetical monster, of the bird kind, feigned to have had the face of a woman, the claws, wings, &c. of a bird, remarkable for rapaciousness, and on that account used to signify a ravenous or exceedingly covetous person; an extortioner.

HARQUEBUSS, s. a hand-gun. See ARQUEBUSE.

HARQUEBUSSIER, s. one armed with an arquebuse.

HARRIER, s. a hound of excellent scent, and great eagerness after the game; a hare-hound.

HARRINGTON, a sea-port of Cumberland, between Workington and Whitehaven, being 4 miles from the former, and 6 from the latter port. Its principal business arises from the collieries and ship-building.

HARROW, or HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, a village in Middlesex, 9 miles W. N. W. of London, with a celebrated free school. Its church, situated on a high hill, is seen at a great distance.

HARROW, s. [charroue, Fr.] a frame of timbers crossing each other, set with iron teeth, and drawn over plowed and sown land, to break the clods and cover the seeds with earth.

To HARROW, v. a. to draw a harrow over ground. Figuratively, to tear or rip up. To pillage, strip, or lay waste. To disturb, or put into alarm or commotion.

HARROWER, s. he who harrows; a kind of hawk.

HARROWGATE, a village of Yorkshire, in the parish of Knaresborough, remarkable for its mineral waters, which are vitriolic, and sulphureous. Bathing is the most general mode of using them; and they are often successful in dropsical, scorbutic, and gouty cases. The Harrowgate water, when first drawn, is transparent, and emits a few air-bubbles; it possesses a strongly foetid sulphureous smell, similar to that of bilge-water, and is of a bitter, nauseous, and strongly saline taste. After being exposed for several hours to the open air, it becomes turbid, assumes a greenish colour, loses its sulphureous smell, and deposits sulphur at the bottom and sides of the vessel. It is two miles W. of Knaresborough, and 211 N. by W. of London.

To HARRY, v. a. [hârier, Fr.] to disturb; to throw into commotion; to alarm or confuse; to ruffle; to harass.

HARSH, a. [harvische, Teut. according to Skinner] roughly sour, applied to the taste. Rough or disagreeable to the ear, applied to sound. Crabbed, morose, or peevish, applied to the temper. Rough or rugged, applied to the touch. Unpleasing, severe, or rigorous, applied to treatment.

HARSHLY, ad. sourly, or like unripe fruit, applied to taste. In a violent manner. In a crabbed, sour, austere, or morose manner. Severely, or rigorously. Rough and displeasing to the ear, applied to sound.

HARSHNESS, s. sourness; austere taste; roughness; crabbedness; moroseness; peevishness.

HART, s. [heort, Sax.] a male of the deer kind, the female of which is a hind or roe.

HARTCLOVER, s. a kind of trefoil.

HARTFORD, and not Hertford, (if its origin be derived from a hart, the arms of the place, deer being formerly very numerous in this part of the country,) the county-town of Hertfordshire, in a hundred of the same name. It has a market on Saturday, is seated on the river Lea, and has been much more considerable than at present; for it is much decayed since the great road was turned through Ware. However, it is still the place where the assizes are held, has the title of an earldom; sends two members to parliament; and is 21 miles N. of London.

HARTFORDSHIRE, an English county, 36 miles in length and 28 in breadth; bounded on the E. by Essex; on the W. by Buckinghamshire; on the N. by Cambridgeshire and Bedfordshire, and on the S. by Middlesex. It contains eight market-towns, whereof two, Hartford and St. Alban's, send members to parliament. It abounds in corn, river-fish, sheep, and fat cattle; and the air is good all over the county. The principal rivers are, the Lea, the Coln, and the Hunton. Hartford is the capital town. Population, 129,714.

HARTLAND, a town in Devonshire, partly concerned in the herring-fishery on this coast. It is seated on the Bristol Channel, near a promontory called Hartland Point, 28 miles W. S. W. of Barnstaple, and 214 W. by S. of London. Market on Saturday.

HARTLEPOOL, a pretty large sea-port town, of the county of Durham, seated on a promontory, partly surrounded by rocks and hills, and partly by the sea. It is governed by a mayor, and has a safe harbour, where the Newcastle and Sunderland colliers generally take shelter in stress of weather. It has a considerable fishery on the coast, and a large exportation of coals and lime. It is 16 miles E. S. E. of Durham, and 258 N. by W. of London. Market on Monday.

HARTLEY, a town of Northumberland, on the coast a little N. W. of Tynemouth. Here are coal, salt, copperas, and glass-works; and a pretty haven, or harbour, to which a canal has been cut, through a solid rock, 52 feet deep, 30 broad, and 900 long.

HARTROYAL, s. a plant; a species of buckthorn plantain.

HARTSHORN, s. in Medicine, a salt and spirit extracted from the horn of a hart, called the red deer. The salt is used as a sudorific; the spirit has all the virtues of volatile alkalis; and both are used for bringing people out of fits, by being applied to the nose. The raspings of the horn are, by boiling in water, formed into jellies for consumptive people; and the bone, being calcined and powdered, is used to absorb acidities in the stomach, and as drink, when boiled, in diarrhoeas.

HARTWORT, s. in Botany, an umbelliferous plant, of which there are two kinds; found in hedges and corn-fields.

HARVEST, s. [harfest, Sax.] the season of reaping and gathering in corn; corn ripened, reaped, and gathered in. Figuratively, the product or reward of a person's labour.

HARVEST-HOME, s. the song sung by reapers at the feast made for having inned the harvest.

HARVEST-LORD, s. the head reaper at the harvest.

HARVEST-MAN, s. one who labours at the harvest.

HARWICH, a sea-port and borough of Essex, seated on a tongue or point of land, opposite to the united mouths of the Stour and Orwell, 42 miles E. by N. of Chelmsford, and 71 E. N. E. of London. It is not very large, but is well inhabited and frequented, and here the packet-boats are stationed that sail to Helvoetsluys, regularly every Wednesday and Saturday, if wind and weather do not prevent, in time of peace. It has a very safe, spacious, and convenient harbour, extending from the sea to within two miles of Ipswich, and able to receive ships of 100 guns all the way; here is also a very good dock-yard for building ships, with the necessary store-houses, cranes, launches, &c. The washing and undermining of the tides, and the falling off of large pieces of cliff, have made the point a peninsula, and perhaps may in time make it an island. The harbour is defended by Landguard Fort, built on a sandy point on the Suffolk side of the water, and other strong works. It is a place of considerable trade, and has many vessels employed in the North Sea fishery. Lat. 51. 56. N. lon. 1. 13. E. It is governed by a mayor; sends two members to parliament; and has markets on Tuesdays and Fridays.

To HASH, v. n. [hacher, Fr.] to mince, or cut into small pieces. To mingle, used with up.

HASLEMERE, a borough town of Surrey, with a market on Tuesday. It is seated on the edge of the county, next to Hampshire; sends two members to parliament; is governed by a constable; and has two paved streets. It is 12 miles S. W. of Guildford and 42 S. W. of London.

HASLET, or HARSLET, s. [hastier, Fr.] the entrails of a hog, consisting of the heart, liver, &c. generally applied to them when enclosed in a membrane, and roasted or baked.

HASLINGDON, or Haslinden, a small town in Lancashire, 14 miles N. by W. of Manchester, and 196 N. N. W. of London. Market on Wednesday. Inhabitants, 5127.

HASP, s. [haps, Sax.] a clasp folded over a staple, and fastened with a padlock; a small iron or brass fastening into a door; a kind of hank, going into an eye or a loop, used for fastening shoes, necklaces, &c.

To HASP, v. a. to shut with a hasp.

HASSOCK, s. [haseck, Teut.] a round or cylindrical mat, stuffed, on which a person kneels at church.

HAST, the second person singular of HAVE, declined thus, I have, thou hast, he hath or has.

HASTE, s. [haste, Fr.] hurry; speed; the act of doing a thing quickly for want of longer time. Passion; vehemence; anger.

To HASTE, or HASTEN, v. n. [haster, Fr.] to move or walk with swiftness; to do a thing in a short time; to be in a hurry; to quicken a person's motion, or drive to a swifter pace.

HASTENER, s. one that hastens or hurries.

HASTILY, ad. in a short time; without delay; in a hurry, or rashly; passionately.

HASTINESS, s. speed or expedition; a performance executed in a hurry; anger; vehemence; testiness.

HASTINGS, s. corruptly for hastive, a French term, sometimes used in English for early, forward. The hastive fruits are strawberries and cherries; we have also hastive peas, &c. A popular term for green peas.

HASTINGS, a borough-town of Sussex, with markets on Wednesdays and Saturdays. It is one of the Cinque Ports, and noted for being the place where William the Conqueror landed. Near this town, in the year 1066, was fought the most memorable battle in the annals of this country, between Harold II. king of England, and William, duke of Normandy, in which the former lost his life and kingdom. Of the Normans, there fell near 15,000 men, and a much greater number of the English were killed in the pursuit. It has only one church, which is of stone, and the Old Town comprises about 500 houses, built with brick and stone. In consequence of its having become a fashionable watering place, a New Town has lately arisen at what was called the Priory, about a quarter of a mile westward of the Old Town. Hastings has no manufacture; and the chief employment of the people is fishing and boat-building. It had once a strong castle, now in ruins; and its harbour, which was formerly of much consequence, is now only an indifferent road for small vessels. It is governed by a mayor; sends two members to parliament, and is 24 miles E. of Lewes, and 64 S. E. of London.

HASTY, a. [hastif, Fr.] moving with swiftness; quick, or speedy. Soon provoked, applied to the temper or humour. Rash, precipitate, or undertaking without thought. Early ripe. Hasty pudding, a pudding made of milk and flour, or of oatmeal and water, boiled quick together. SYNON. Hasty relates more to actions or blows: passionate goes seldom farther than words.

HAT, s. [hat, Sax.] a covering for the head. In Botany, the upper broad part of funguses.

HATBAND, s. a string tied round a hat to keep the crown from stretching, or, if too large, to make it fit the head better; a piece of silk or crape worn round the crown of a hat in mourning.

HATBOX, or HATCASE, s. a slight box for a hat.

To HATCH, v. a. [hecken, Teut.] to produce young from eggs; to quicken an egg by sitting on it; to produce by any precedent action. Figuratively, to contrive or project.

HATCH, s. a brood proceeding from eggs; the act of excluding or producing young from the egg. Figuratively, disclosure or discovery. A short or half door; an opening over a door, which is closed or shut by a board moving on hinges. In the plural, the doors, or openings, in a ship, by which persons descend from one deck to another. To be under hatches, means to be in a state of ignominy, poverty, or depression.

To HACHEL, v. a. [hachelen, Teut.] to beat flax, in order to separate the fibrous from the brittle part.

HACHEL, s. [hachell, Teut.] the instrument with which flax is beaten.

HACHELLER, s. a beater of flax.

HATCHET, s. [hachette, Fr.] a small axe.

HATCHET-FACE, s. an ugly face; so called, according to Johnson, because such a one might be hewn out of a block with a hatchet.

HATCHMENT, s. [corrupted from achievement] the arms of a person who is dead, painted on a square board, and placed with an angle downwards over the door where he lived, or fixed against the wall of a church.

HATCHWAY, s. the way over or through the hatches of a ship.

To HATE, v. a. [hatian, Sax.] to regard as an object which may affect us with pain; or to detest on account of its being evil, and repugnant to the laws of morality, of our country, or of God. To abhor; to abominate; to detest. SYNON. To hate implies an aversion actuated by revenge; to abhor, an aversion to that for which we have a natural antipathy; to loathe, is more applicable to food; to detest, implies aversion actuated by disapprobation.

HATE, s. an aversion in the mind from any thing or person which is considered as capable, or willing, to affect us with pain, together with a desire of procuring the pain or the unhappiness of the person who is considered as having such an intention; detestation; malignity; hatred.

HATEFUL, a. that causes abhorrence, aversion, or detestation; detesting, hating, or malicious.

HATEFULLY, ad. in an odious or abominable manner; so as to cause aversion, detestation, or hatred.

HATEFULNESS, s. the quality which renders a person or thing the object of hatred.

HATER, s. one who has a strong aversion or ill-will to a person or thing; an abhorrer; a detester.

HATFIELD, a town of Hartfordshire, on the river Lea, with a market on Thursday. Here the marquis of Salisbury has a handsome palace, called Hatfield-House. It is 19 miles N. N. W. of London.—Also, a town in W. Yorkshire, 4 miles from Doncaster, with a chase, famous for deer hunting.

HATFIELD-BROAD-OAK, a town of Essex, with a market on Saturday. It is seated on a branch of the river Lea, near a forest of the same name; and is 50 miles E. N. E. of London.

HATH, the third person singular of HAVE. Hath properly belongs to the serious and solemn: has to the familiar. The same may be observed of doth and does.

HATHERLEY, a corporate town of Devonshire, with a market on Friday, and a woollen manufacture. It is a small place, with one good inn; and is 26 miles N. W. of Exeter, and 201 W. by S. of London.

HATRED, s. the thought or the pain which any thing present or absent is apt to produce in us; the aversion or passion which is occasioned by considering a thing as apt to cause us pain, or by considering a person as wilfully endeavouring to thwart our happiness. Dislike; detestation.

To HATTER, v. a. to harass, or wear out with fatigue.

HATTER, s. one who makes hats.

HATTOCK, s. [attock, Erse] a shock of corn.

HAVA'NNAH, a city and sea-port on the N. W. part of the island of Cuba, two miles in circuit, and the capital of the island, with an university. The harbour is capable of containing commodiously 1000 vessels, without either cable or anchor. The entrance to it is by a narrow channel, strongly fortified with platforms, works and artillery, for at least half a mile the length of the passage. On the E. side of the mouth of the channel is the famous Moro Fort, mounted with 40 pieces of cannon, almost level with the water; and on the opposite side a strong fort, called the Puntal, adjoining to the town. All the ships that come from the Spanish American settlements, rendezvous here on their return to Spain. The population is estimated at 25,000 Spaniards, mulattoes, and negroes. The houses are elegant, built of stone, and some of them superbly finished; and the churches, and other public buildings, are rich and magnificent. Provisions are extravagantly dear; neither is the fresh meat of the best kind, excepting pork; an inconvenience not owing to any defect in the soil of the island, but to the indolence of the Spaniards. In 1762, the Havannah was taken by an English squadron and army, under Sir G. Pocock and lord Albemarle. The Moro Fort was taken by storm, after a siege of 29 days. Twelve men of war and three frigates were taken at the same time with the town. It was restored, however, by the peace of 1763. In 1810 it suffered much damage from a hurricane, followed by an earthquake. Lat. 23. 9. N. lon. 82. 23. W.

HA'VANT, a town of Hampshire, with a market on Saturday, 7 miles N. E. of Portsmouth, and 66 W. by S. of London.

To HEDGE, v. a. to enclose with a fence of trees or bushes. Used with up, to obstruct or stop up a passage. To force in with difficulty; to make way into a place already full, by that way which requires the least room; but in this sense it seems to be mistaken for edge.

HEDGE-BORN, a. of no known birth; meanly born.

HEDGEHOG, s. [so called from the bristles which surround it, as it were with a hedge] in Natural History, a four-footed animal, having its back, sides, and flanks, set with strong and sharp prickles, which by the help of a muscle can contract itself into a globular form, and withdraw its whole under part, head, belly, and legs, within its thicket of prickles. A term of reproach. In Botany, a plant; trefoil. In Ichthyology, the globe-fish.

HEDGE-NOTE, s. low and mean writing.

HEDGER, s. one who makes or repairs hedges.

HEDGEROW, s. several trees planted in a line for an enclosure.

HEDGE-SPARROW, s. a sparrow that lives in bushes, distinguished from a sparrow that builds in thatch.

HEDGING-BILL, s. a kind of axe or hatchet, in the form of a hook, with which hedges are cut.

To HEED, v. a. [hedan, Sax.] to mind; to take notice of. Neuterly, to view with care and attention.

HEED, s. [hede, Sax.] care; earnest application of the mind; caution; notice; care to avoid; regard or respectful notice; seriousness; staidness.

HEEDFUL, a. cautious, or careful of the immediate effects or consequences of an action; attentive, or careful in taking notice or observing; suspicious; scrutinizing.

HEEDFULLY, ad. in an attentive or cautious manner.

HEEDFULNESS, s. caution; attentive notice.

HEEDILY, ad. cautiously; vigilantly; scrupulously.

HEEDINESS, s. caution; vigilance.

HEEDLESS, a. negligent; inattentive.

HEEDLESSLY, ad. in an inattentive or careless manner.

HEEDLESSNESS, s. carelessness; negligence; inattention; thoughtlessness.

HEEL, s. [hele, Sax.] the hinder part of the foot; any thing which covers, or is shaped like, a heel; hence it is applied in the phrase, To be out of heel, i. e. to be very much impaired, or in a declining condition. "A good man's fortune may grow out at heels." Shak. To be at the heels, is to pursue closely. To lay by the heels, is to fetter, shackle, or imprison. To have the heels of, to outrun.

To HEEL, v. n. to dance by beating the heels on the ground, as in jigs. To lean on one side, applied to a ship.

HEELER, s. a cock that strikes well with his heels.

HEELPIECE, s. a piece of leather, &c. sewed on the heel of a shoe, to repair what is worn away.

HEFT, s. [from heave] a keck, or a violent effort made to discharge something nauseous from the stomach. The handle of a knife, &c. of heft, Sax. Hold.

HEGIRA. See HEJ'RA.

HEIDELBERG, a city of Germany, in the Palatinate of the Rhine, with a celebrated university. It has manufactures of woollen stuffs, carpets, silk stockings, velvet, and soap. It was the capital of the Palatinate, and noted for a great tun, which held 800 hogsheads. It is situated in a fertile country, on the S. side of the Neckar, over which it has a handsome bridge, 12 miles E. of Spire. Lat. 49. 21. N. lon. 8. 38. E.

HEIFER, s. [heafere, Sax.] a young cow.

HEIGH-HO, interject. a word used to express slight languor and uneasiness; sometimes a joyful exultation.

HEIGHT, s. distance or space above ground; space measured upwards; altitude; elevation. In Geography, the degree of latitude from the equator. A summit, ascent, or eminence. Figuratively, elevation, rank, or dignity above others; the utmost degree, perfection, or exertion.

To HEIGHTEN, v. a. to raise above ground, or on high; to prefer, or raise to a higher post; to improve, or raise to higher degree of perfection; to aggravate, or increase any bad quality; to adorn or make more beautiful or splendid by ornaments.

HEINOUS, (the ei in this word and its derivatives pronounced like e long—hē-nous) a. [haineux, Fr.] wicked in a high degree; atrocious; shameful; odious.

HEINOUSLY, ad. in a very wicked or atrocious manner.

HEINOUSNESS, s. the quality which makes an action exceedingly wicked; atrociousness.

HEIR, (the ei in this word and its derivatives, &c. pron. like e long—hēr, hēr-ship) s. [hæres, Lat.] in Civil Law, one who succeeds to the whole estate of another, after his death, whether by right of blood or testament. In Common Law, one who succeeds, by right of blood, to any man's lands or tenements in fee. An heir apparent is he on whom the succession is so settled, that it cannot be altered without altering the laws of succession. Heir presumptive is the nearest relation to the present successor, who, without the particular will of the testator, cannot be set aside.

To HEIR, v. a. to possess by right of inheritance.

HEIRDOM, s. succession by inheritance.

HEIRESS, s. a female who inherits.

HEIRLESS, a. without children to inherit.

HEIRLOOM, s. a word that comprehends in it divers pieces of furniture, as the first bed, and other things, which by the custom of some places have belonged to some house for several descents. These go to the heir along with the house by custom, and not by common law, and are never inventoried, after the death of the owner, as chattels.

HEIRSHIP, s. state, character, or privileges of an heir.

HEJ'RA, frequently, but improperly, spelt HEGIRA and HEGYRA, s. [Arab.] flight; now applied by the Arabs to signify a voluntary exile, or flight to escape persecution; to fly, or run away from one's friends, relations, and country. In Chronology, a celebrated epocha, from whence the Mohammedans compute their time; which took its origin from Mohammed's flight from Mecca, on the evening of Friday, the 16th of July, A. D. 622, during the reign of the emperor Heraclius, being driven out by the magistrates, lest his imposture should occasion a sedition. As the years of the Hej'ra consist of only 354 days, they are reduced to the Julian calendar, by multiplying the year of the Hej'ra by 354, dividing the product by 365, subtracting the intercalary days, or as many times as there are four years in the quotient, and adding 622 to the remainder.

HELD, the preter. and part. pass. of HOLD.

HELENA, ST. an island in the S. Atlantic Ocean, belonging to the English East-India Company, in circumference about 27 miles; and having the appearance, at a distance, of a rock or castle rising out of the ocean. It is accessible at only one particular spot, where the town is seated, in a valley, at the bottom of a bay, between two steep, dreary mountains. It has some high mountains, particularly one called Diana's Peak, which is covered with woods to the very top. There are other hills also, which bear evident marks of volcanic origin; and some have huge rocks of lava, and a kind of half-vitrified flags. The country is far from being barren: the little hills are covered with rich verdure, and interspersed with fertile valleys, which contain gardens, orchards, and various plantations. The soil which covers the rocks and mountains, is, in general, a rich mould, from six to ten inches deep, clothed with a variety of plants and shrubs. The walks of peach-trees are loaded with fruit, of a peculiarly rich flavour; but other European fruit-trees and vines, which have been planted here, do not succeed. Cabbages, and other greens, thrive extremely well, but are devoured by the caterpillars; as are the barley, and other kinds of grain, by the rats, which are very numerous. The ground, for these reasons, is laid out chiefly for pastures, the verdure of which is surprising; and the island can support 3000 head of their small cattle. Here are English sheep, and a small breed of horses, with goats and rabbits. The fowls are ring-pheasants, red-legged partridges, rice-birds, pigeons, &c. of some of which the breed is indigenous, but others have been brought from Europe, Africa, and the East Indies. The number of inhabitants on the island is about 3000, including 600 soldiers, and nearly 1400 negroes, who are supplied with corn and merchandize by the company's ships, in return for refreshments; and many of the slaves are employed in catching fish, which are very plentiful. This island is situated between the continents of Africa and S. America, about 1200 miles W. of the former, and 1800 E. of the latter. Lat. 15. 55. S. lon. 5. 43. W.—On the second deposition of the Emperor Napoleon, this island was fixed on by the British government, and its allies, as his place of confinement; he arrived here on the 17th of October, 1815, and died on the 5th of May, 1821. His remains were buried near Longwood, which had been his residence, under a vigilant superintendency.

HELEN'S, ST. a town of the Isle of Wight, in East Medina, which has a bay that runs a considerable way within land, and in time of war is often the station and place of rendezvous for the royal navy. It is not a place of much consideration otherwise.—Also, a considerable village 3 miles N. E. of Prescot, in Lancashire. In and near it are a variety of manufactures, particularly an extensive copper work, and a still larger one at Ravenhead, for casting plate glass. The Sankey canal begins at the coal mines here, and takes a circuitous course by Newton to the river Mersey, below Warrington.

HELIAL, a. [ἡλιακός, Gr.] emerging from the lustre of the sun, or falling into it. Helial rising, in Astronomy, is applied to a star, which, after having been hid by the sun's rays, rises before it, and by that means becomes visible. Helial setting is applied to a star which approaches so near to the sun as to be hid by its rays.

HELIAL, ad. [from ἡλιακός, Gr.] in Astronomy, in such a manner as to emerge from the sun's rays, and become visible; or so as to approach so near to the sun as to be hid by its splendour.

HELICAL, a. [from ἑλίζ, Gr.] spiral, or twisting like a corkscrew.

HELIER, ST. the capital of the island of Jersey, in the British Channel, on the coast of France. It is seated in St. Aubin's Bay, in a tide harbour, and with a stone pier, having the sea on the S. W. and hills on the N. Another large hill or rock projects, in a manner, over the town, which has been converted into a strong fortress. The town contains about 1000 houses, mostly shops, standing in wide streets, well paved. The inhabitants are computed at 6000, and in their place of worship the French and English languages are used alternately. It has manufactures of woollen caps and stockings, and a considerable trade in the Newfoundland fishery. Lon. 2. 10. W. lat. 49. 11. N. In the bay, a little to the S. W. of the town, is the small island St. Helier, about a mile in circuit, containing Elizabeth Castle, which is wholly occupied by the governor and garrison: it is a peninsula from half-flood to half-ebb, during which time there is a passage, called the bridge, to the town.

HELIGOLAND, an island in the German ocean, between the mouths of the Eyder and the Elbe, formerly belonging to Denmark, but lately ceded to Great Britain. It is a place of considerable strength, and serves as a dépôt for merchandize; from whence it is afterwards sent to the continent as opportunity serves. Lon. 8. 20. E. lat. 54. 8. N.

HELIOCENTRIC, a. [from ἥλιος and κέντρον, Gr.] in Astronomy, applied to the place of a planet, as it would appear from the sun, were the eye fixed in its centre.

HELIOSCOPE, s. [helioscope, Fr. from ἥλιος and σκοπέω, Gr.] a kind of telescope fitted for looking at the body of the sun, without hurting the eyes.

HELIOTROPE, s. [ἡλιοτρόπιον, Gr.] the sun-flower.

HELISPHERICAL, a. [from helix and sphere] in Navigation, applied to the rhumb line, because on the globe it winds spirally round the pole, advancing continually nearer and nearer towards, without terminating in it.

HELIX, s. [ἑλίζ, Gr.] a spiral line, or that which resembles a corkscrew; a circumvolution.

HELL, s. [helle, Sax.] the place wherein the devil and wicked souls are confined; the wicked spirits, or inhabitants of hell; a place of inconceivable misery. Used in former times, as the Greek ᾗδης, for the place of departed spirits; as, "He descended into hell." Apostle's Creed.

HELL-BROTH, s. a composition boiled up for infernal purposes.

HELL-DOOMED, a. consigned to hell.

HELLEBORE, s. [helleborus, Lat.] a plant, the root of which was formerly used as a cathartic, but of little esteem in modern practice; the Christmas-flower.

HELL-HOUND, s. [helle hund, Sax.] the fabled dog which guards the infernal regions. Figuratively, an agent or emissary of the devil; a profligate person.

HELLENISM, s. [ἑλληνισμός, Gr.] idiom, phrase, or manner of expression, peculiar to the Greek.

HELLESPONT, a. a narrow point of the sea, between Europe on the W. Asia on the E. the Propontis or Sea of Marmora northward, and the Ægean Sea, or Archipelago, southward. It had its name from Helle, daughter to Athamas, king of Thebes, who is said to have been drowned here. It is now called the Strait of the Dardanelles, from two Turkish towers, so denominated, by which it is guarded on either side; also Strait of Gallipoli, from the town of that name at its entrance.

HELLISH, a. [hellice, Sax.] having the qualities of hell, or the devil; excessively wicked or malicious; sent from hell.

HELLISHLY, ad. in a very wicked and malicious manner; wickedly; or like the devil.

HELLISHNESS, s. wickedness in excess; any quality inconsistent with goodness, rendering us like the devil.

HELM, s. [Sax.] a covering formerly worn in war to protect and defend the head. That part of a coat of arms which bears the crest. The upper part or head of a retort, in Chemistry. The rudder or board, by which the course of a vessel is directed or altered, from helma, Sax.; the steerage. Figuratively, a post in the administration, or the station of those who conduct the affairs of a government.

To HELM, v. a. to move the helm, in order to guide the course of a vessel. Figuratively, to guide or conduct.

HELMED, a. wearing a helmet or head-piece.

HELMET, s. [elmetto, Ital.] a covering for the head worn formerly in battle. In Botany, the upper part of a gaping blossom.

HELMINTHIC, a. [from ελμινθος, Gr.] relating to worms.

HE' LMSLEY-BLACKMORE, or Helmsley, a town in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, on the river Rye, with a brook running through it. The houses are pretty well built with stone, and covered with slate. It has the remains of a castle, and a market on Saturday. It is 20 miles N. of York, and 218 N. by W. of London.

To HELP, v. a. [pret. helped, part. helped or holpen; helpan, Sax. hilpan, Goth.] to assist, aid, or support a person to enable him to perform any thing. Figuratively, to free from pain or disease. To cure; to heal. To remedy. To promote; to forward. To forbear, avoid, or refrain from, followed by a participle of the present tense; as, "I cannot help remarking." Pope. To prevent, or hinder; as, "If they take offence, we cannot help it." To carve, or hand meat to a person at table. To help up, to assist a person to raise himself from the ground. To help out, to assist in extricating from a difficulty. To help over, to enable to surmount. To help off, to assist in removing or disposing. To help to, to supply with.

HELP, s. [hulpe, Belg.] assistance or aid in weakness; support in necessity; relief in distress; that which forwards or promotes; the person or thing which assists. A remedy, followed by for. "There is no help for it." Holder. SYNON. We use the word help, in labour; succour, in danger; assist in want; relieve, in distress. The first springs from goodness; the second, from generosity; the third, from humanity; the fourth, from compassion.

HELPER, s. one who assists or enables a person to perform any thing; a supernumerary servant, employed only occasionally; one who supplies with any thing wanted.

HELPFUL, a. useful; that supplies any defect either in bodily strength or understanding; wholesome, or salutary. Promoting or advancing any end.

HEN-PECKED, a. figuratively, subject to, or governed by, a wife.

HEN-ROOST, s. a place where poultry rest.

HENRY I. surnamed Beauclerc, youngest son of William I. ascended the throne of England while his brother Robert was returning from the Holy Land. William de Breteuil, and other lords, would have seized the crown and sceptre at Winchester, with the royal treasure there deposited, alleging they were obliged by oath to acknowledge Robert for king, in case William died without heirs, according to the treaty between the two brothers. There was quickly a great concourse of people from all parts; and Henry, well knowing how they stood affected, drew his sword, and swore no man should take possession of the crown but whom the people approved. The lords hereupon retired to a room to consult what was proper to be done, whilst the people, with loud acclamations, made the name of Henry resound in their ears: so, fearing that the opposing the inclinations of the people might bring on a civil war, they resolved that Henry should succeed to the crown. Upon this, Henry made haste to London, and the next day, Aug. 5, 1100, was crowned by Maurice, bishop of that see, who administered to him the usual oath. To secure himself on the throne, he wisely began his reign by reforming abuses, redressing grievances, and doing many popular things, according to his late promise; and granted a charter of liberties, confining the royal authority within its ancient bounds, renouncing the unjust prerogatives the two late kings had usurped, restoring the church to her former rights, and confirming the laws of king Edward. He moreover remitted all arrears of debt to the crown, and appointed a standard for weights and measures throughout the kingdom. In 1101 Henry recalled Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, and married Matilda, or Maud, daughter of Malcolm, king of Scotland, by Margaret, sister to Edgar Atheling; by which means the royal family of the Saxons was united to that of Normandy. Robert had still a great party in the kingdom for him, and upon his landing at Portsmouth was received without opposition. But Henry managed matters so well by means of Anselm, who was in great credit with the people, that Robert's measures were quite disconcerted, and matters were accommodated between them, upon condition, that if one of the two brothers died without issue, the survivor should succeed to his dominions; that the king should deliver up to Robert the castles of Normandy that were garrisoned with English, and should pay him 3000 marks a year. In 1103 a contest began between the king and archbishop Anselm, about the right of investiture of bishops and abbots, and their doing homage to the king, which Henry insisted on as a prerogative derived from his ancestors; but the council at Rome decreed, that no bishops should receive investiture from laymen. This contest ran high, and lasted several years; at last it was compromised by Henry's renouncing the right of investiture, and the pope's allowing the bishops and abbots to do homage to the king for their temporalities. And now his attention was called to another affair. Robert de Belesme, to be revenged on the king, who had caused him to be proclaimed a traitor, fell upon such of his subjects as had lands in Normandy. Duke Robert marched against him, but was worsted, and in the end was forced to clap up a peace with him on dishonourable terms; notwithstanding which, Belesme ravaged the country: hereupon some of the chief men in Normandy applied to the king of England for relief. Henry, wanting to get this duchy into his own hands, passed over into Normandy, and had great success in his first campaign; but in his second, Robert, perceiving his design, and having in vain sued for peace, joined with Belesme and the rest against him, who led all their forces to his assistance. Robert having a considerable army, gave his brother battle under the walls of Tinchebray, which was besieged by Henry. The battle lasted not long; Robert was beaten, and taken prisoner, as were also Edgar Atheling, the earl of Mortaigne, 400 knights, and 1000 soldiers. Prince Edgar was set at liberty, and passed the remainder of his days in England. The earl of Mortaigne was imprisoned in the Tower of London, and duke Robert in Cardiff castle, in Wales, where he remained till his death, about 26 years after. The king, by this battle, which was fought in 1107, was master of all Normandy, and returned in triumph to England, where he behaved with great arrogance, and permitted any abuses which turned to his profit. The king did not enjoy Normandy quietly; for Lewis le Gros, king of France, invested William Crito, duke Robert's son, with the duchy of Normandy, and a smart war was carried on for some time; at last, in 1120, a peace was concluded between the two kings. But to return back; in 1109 the king's daughter, Maud, was married to the emperor Henry V. which furnished him with a pretence for laying a tax of 3s. on every hide of land, in order to pay her marriage portion; which raised an immense sum. About this time died that haughty prelate Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury: the king seized on the revenues of the archbishopric, and kept them five years in his hands. The next year was remarkable for the restoration of learning at Cambridge, where it had for a long time been quite neglected. In 1112 great numbers of Flemings, being obliged to leave their country by the inundation of the sea, came into England, and were settled about Ross and Pembroke. About this time the Welsh committed great ravages upon the frontiers; but Henry marching against them, they retired to the mountains. Some years after, they committed the like depredations, which occasioned another invasion of Wales, but that soon ended in a peace; however,

Henry obliged them to give him hostages, and 1000 head of cattle, to make him amends for the charge of the war. In 1115 Henry got the states of Normandy to swear fealty to prince William his son, then 12 years old; and the year following he did the same in England, to secure the crown to his family. In 1118 queen Matilda died. A year or two after prince William his son was unfortunately drowned as he was returning from Normandy, by the ship striking on a rock, and his whole company, amounting to about 150, except a very few who saved themselves by swimming. However, the king, desirous of another son, married Adelicia, daughter of Geoffrey, earl of Louvain; but she never proved with child. In 1123 cardinal John de Crema, the pope's legate, came over to England, to put the finishing stroke to the celibacy of the clergy. A synod being convened at London, he got some severe canons passed against such ecclesiastics as persisted in keeping their wives. The design of the court of Rome, in thus contending for the single life of the clergy, was to make them independent of the civil power, and to incorporate them into a society apart, to be governed by its own laws, which could not be so well done, whilst the clergy were allowed to marry, and have children. King Henry, by his seeming zeal on this article, politically got from the pope a power to put it in execution; which done, he gave the priests liberty to keep their wives, upon paying him a sum of money for a dispensation. The king having no child by his second wife, after having been married to her six years, in 1127 assembled a great council, and got them to acknowledge his daughter Maud, who was returned to England upon the emperor's death, presumptive heir to the crown. Stephen, earl of Bulloign, who was afterwards king, was the first who took the oath of allegiance to her, in case Henry died without male issue. Soon after he married her to Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou. In 1133, he caused the states of Normandy to take an oath of fealty to her and prince Henry her son. King Henry went over to Normandy the latter end of the summer, and died there on December 1, 1133, in the 68th year of his age, and 36th of his reign. His body was brought over, and buried in the abbey of Reading, which he had founded. He built several other abbeys, with the priory of Dunstable, and founded the sees of Ely and Carlisle. Henry was of a middle stature, and robust make, with dark brown hair, and blue serene eyes. He was facetious, fluent, and affable to his favourites. His capacity, naturally good, was improved and cultivated in such a manner, that he acquired the surname of Beauclerc by his learning. He was cool, cautious, politic, and penetrating; his courage was unquestioned, and his fortitude invincible. He was vindictive, cruel, and implacable; inexorable to offenders, rigid and severe in the execution of justice, and though temperate in his diet, a voluptuary in his amours, which produced a numerous family of illegitimate issue. His Norman descent and connections with the continent inspired him with a contempt for the English, whom he oppressed in the most tyrannical manner, not only by increasing the number of the forests, which were too numerous before, but also by his unconscionable exactions; in consequence of which he was enabled to maintain expensive wars on the continent, and was allowed to be the richest prince in Europe when he died.

HENRY II. was in Normandy when king Stephen died, the empress Maud his mother having delivered up that duchy to him. He arrived in England about six weeks after the late king expired, and was crowned at Westminster, December 19, 1154, being then in the 23rd of his age. He was the first of the race of the Plantagenets, and had been for some time earl of Anjou, &c. by the death of his father Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, &c. He was also possessed of Poitou, Guienne, and Saintonge, by virtue of his marriage with Eleanor, heiress of the house of Poitiers, after Lewis the Young, king of France, had divorced her. In him the Saxon line was restored, he being descended by the mother's side from the Saxon kings. The first acts of his reign seemed to promise a happy and prosperous administration. He instantly dismissed the mercenary soldiers, who had committed the greatest disorders throughout the nation. He ordered all the castles which had been erected since the death of Henry I. to be demolished, except a few which he retained in his own hands for the protection of the kingdom. The adulterated coin which had been struck during the reign of Stephen was cried down, and new money struck of the right value and standard. He resumed many of those benefactions which had been made to churches and monasteries in the former reigns. He gave charters to several towns, by which the citizens claimed their freedom and privileges, independent of any superior but himself. These charters were the ground-work of the English liberty; for thus a new order, namely, the more opulent of the people, began to claim a share in the administration, as well as the nobility and clergy. Thus the feudal government was at first impaired; and liberty began to be more equally diffused throughout the nation. He went over to do homage to the king of France in 1156, for the provinces he held there; but the chief motive of his crossing the sea was to recover Anjou from his brother Geoffrey. In 1157 he marched with a great army into Wales, to revenge their ravages on the frontiers; but they retired to their mountains, as usual, where, having pent them up for some time, and laid waste their country, he granted them a peace, by one of the articles reserving to himself the liberty of cutting large roads, through their woods, that he might more easily penetrate into their country. In 1158 prince Richard was born, and a few days after king Henry was crowned a second time in the suburbs of Lincoln. The next year the king had another son born, who was named Geoffrey; and the same year he was crowned again, together with his queen, at Worcester. About this time his brother Geoffrey dying, he went over to France to lay claim to the earldom of Nants, which he obtained, and concluded a marriage between his eldest son Henry, about five years old, and Margaret, the French king's daughter, who was not above so many months; he also made a treaty with Conan duke of Bretagne, for marrying the duke's daughter Constance to Geoffrey, Henry's third son, then but a few months old; which marriage being celebrated five years after, Geoffrey became duke of Bretagne on his father-in-law's death. Henry revived his queen's title to Toulouse; but the king of France opposed him, upon which, in revenge, Henry ravaged his territories; however, a treaty was concluded without making any mention of Toulouse. The war soon after broke out between the two monarchs, upon Henry's precipitating the marriage between prince Henry and the daughter of Lewis, when the former was but seven, and the latter but three years old; quickly after she was brought to England to be educated. Henry did this in order to take possession of Gisors for his son, which the princess was to have for her dower: but this war was soon ended by the mediation of Pope Alexander III. to whom both kings paid a most servile submission, each alighting, and taking hold of the rein of his bridle, to conduct him to his lodgings. The affairs above related detained Henry in France four years, and he returned to England 1163. Peace was settled abroad, but his repose was disturbed by a domestic vexation, which gave him a vast deal of trouble for several years; this was, the famous contest between him and Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury. The pride and ambition of the clergy were got to such an exorbitant height as to be detrimental to the state, and prejudicial to the royal authority; they pretended an exemption from the civil power, and Henry had come to a resolution to redress this grievance, and to reduce them within some tolerable bounds. When a clergyman was accused of a crime, he was tried in the ecclesiastical court, from whence there was no appeal: here the utmost partiality was shewn, and the most heinous crimes were only punished with degradation. The king, being resolved to reform these abuses, thought Becket, who had been his high chancellor, would have been serviceable to him in this good design, and made him archbishop of Canterbury for that very purpose. When the king first mentioned his design to the archbishop, he vehemently opposed it; but resolving to do that, in spite of his efforts to the contrary, which he thought to do by his assistance, he convened the chief lords of the kingdom, both spiritual and temporal, and proposed to them a regulation, which tended to make them more subject to the civil power. The temporal lords agreed to these articles without any hesitation, but the bishops and abbots refused to do it without the addition of this saving clause, "saving the rights of the clergy and church," which was doing nothing at all, till the king threatened them, and then they complied; and even Becket, after standing out a great while, consented without the saving clause. Soon after the king got these articles confirmed by an assembly general, or parliament, which he convened at Clarendon; and here also the prelates, through fear, complied, and the archbishop was with great difficulty prevailed on by his brethren to give his consent to these articles. When these articles were sent to Pope Alexander III. for his sanction, he presently condemned them, as prejudicial to the church; upon which Becket openly declared, that he repented of having promised to subscribe them; and the pope absolved him, and promised to stand by him. The archbishop became more insolent than ever, and this contest between the king and him continued a considerable time. In 1165 the king's daughter Maud was married to Henry duke of Saxony, from which marriage descends his present majesty King George. In 1166 prince John was born; and a little after the empress Maud, the king's mother, of whom so much is said in Stephen's reign, died in the 67th year of her age, and was buried at Roan, in Normandy. The king, having recovered from a dangerous fit of illness, was desirous of passing the rest of his days in quiet, which the pope threatened more and more to disturb, by thundering out against him the censures of the church; and therefore ordered matters so that he was thoroughly reconciled to Becket, and swore to restore him to his former state, protesting he heartily forgave all that was passed. This reconciliation was sincere enough on the king's side, but not so on Becket's. He no sooner arrived in England, than he suspended the archbishop of York, and excommunicated some other bishops who had taken part with the king against him, and proceeded to the same acts of severity against other great men. The bishops, thus put under the censures, repaired to the king in Normandy, and made heavy complaints against Becket's revengeful spirit. The king was so provoked at his turbulent behaviour, that he spoke aloud to the following purport; "It is my great unhappiness, that among all my servants, there is not one who dares to avenge the affronts I am receiving from a wretched priest." From that time four of the king's domestics entered into a plot against Becket's life: accordingly, coming to Canterbury, they took an opportunity to follow him into the cathedral, and advanced after him up to the altar; where they fell upon him, and split his skull with their swords, so that his blood and brains flew all over the altar. This happened in 1171. The next year Henry sent over some forces to make a conquest of Ireland; they had great success, and Henry following with a formidable army, landed at Waterford, upon which the Irish voluntarily submitted, and Henry became master of Ireland. He left Hugh Lacy there to govern in his name, with the title of grand justiciary of Ireland, and set out for England. From England he went over to Normandy, to meet the pope's legates, who were there to examine into Becket's murder; where, after having declared his sorrow for the imprudent words he had dropped, which occasioned the prelate's assassination, he was absolved, upon promising to perform all that was required of him in favour of the pope and church, and to do penance at Becket's tomb, which he did upon his return to England the next year; for, landing at Southampton, he proceeded directly to Canterbury, and, as soon as he came in sight of the town, he alighted, pulled off his boots, and walked barefoot three miles, till he came to the tomb, where he submitted himself to be shamefully scourged by the prior and monks of St. Augustine. In the absence of Henry, a conspiracy was formed against him by his queen Eleanor, and his sons, Henry, Richard, and Geoffrey. Queen Eleanor was moved to this by her extreme jealousy, which had put her on dispatching Rosamond Clifford, commonly called Fair Rosamond, daughter of lord Clifford, the king's chief mistress. The sons wanted sovereignty. In short, the king was in danger of losing all his dominions in France, and William king of Scotland invaded the northern part of England: however, Henry got the better of all his enemies, and the king of Scotland was taken prisoner, and obliged to do homage for the kingdom of Scotland in general, and the county of Galloway in particular, and a peace was restored, 1171. He now applied himself to the affairs of government, and about the year 1176, he divided England into circuits, appointing itinerant judges to go at certain times of the year, and hold the assizes, or administer justice to the people; which is practised at this day. About the same time London bridge began to be built of stone, by Peter Coleman, a priest. The king, the pope's legate, and the archbishop of Canterbury, contributed towards the work. It was finished in about 33 years, during which time the course of the Thames was turned another way, by a trench cut for that purpose from Battersea to Rotherhithe. Henry, who had been all his life a slave to his lust, fell in love with Alice, the daughter of Lewis of France, who was put into his hands to be educated in England, and who was designed for his son Richard; but he detained the young princess from him: this discontented him. Prince Henry and prince Geoffrey were discontented for want of authority; so that, in 1182, their designs began to break out into action, and young Henry repaired to Guienne to stir up the Gascons to revolt; but he died of a fever, 1183. His brother Geoffrey did not long survive him. The death of the young king put a stop for some time to the troubles that were beginning to distract the royal family. But prince Richard, who was now heir to the crown, began about two years afterwards to raise fresh disturbances in the king's foreign dominions. He got the provinces to revolt, and acknowledge him for their sovereign, and did homage for them to Philip king of France. This occasioned a war between the two monarchs; and Henry, now deserted by his French subjects, was obliged at last, 1189, to make peace with Philip upon dishonourable terms. Henry died July 6th, 1189, in the 57th year of his age, and 35th of his reign. He had five sons by Eleanor his queen, of whom only Richard and John survived him. His daughter Eleanor was married to Alphonso king of Castile, and Joanna to

William II. king of Sicily. Henry II. was of the middle stature, and the most exact proportion; his countenance was round, fair, and ruddy; his blue eyes were mild and engaging, except in a transport of passion, when they sparkled like lightning, to the terror of the beholders. He was broad-chested, strong, muscular, and inclined to be corpulent, though he prevented the bad effects of this disposition by hard exercise and continual fatigue; he was temperate in his meals, even to a degree of abstinence, and seldom or never sat down, except at supper: he was eloquent, agreeable, and facetious; remarkably courteous and polite; compassionate to all in distress; so charitable, that he constantly allotted one tenth-part of his household provisions to the poor; and, in a time of dearth which prevailed in Anjou and Le Maine, he maintained ten thousand indigent persons, from the beginning of spring to the end of autumn. His talents, naturally good, he had cultivated with great assiduity, and delighted in the conversation of learned men, to whom he was a generous benefactor. His memory was so surprisingly tenacious, that he never forgot a face nor a circumstance that was worth remembering. Though superior to all his contemporaries in strength, riches, true courage, and military skill, he never engaged in war without reluctance; and was so averse to bloodshed, that he expressed uncommon grief at the loss of every private soldier. Yet was he not exempted from human frailties: his passions, naturally violent, often hurried him into excess; he was prone to anger, transported with the lust of power, and in particular accused of incontinence. However, on the whole, he was the king, the priest, the father of his country, and one of the most powerful and illustrious monarchs that ever flourished on the English throne.

HENRY III. succeeded his father king John: he was then in the 10th year of his age. As soon as John was dead, the earl of Pembroke convened the lords who had constantly adhered to that prince, and presenting young Henry to them, said, "Behold your king!" and then making a pathetic speech to them, which was applauded by the whole assembly, cried out, "Henry shall be our king!" and he was crowned at Gloucester, Oct. 28. After the coronation, the lords chose the earl of Pembroke guardian to the young king, and regent of the kingdom; and then many of the confederate barons began to think of making their peace with the new king. Prince Lewis being obliged to raise the siege of Dover, and being excommunicated by the pope's legate, contributed very much to their submission. A truce was agreed for four months; in the mean time Lewis went over into France for fresh forces, and in his absence many of the barons made their peace with the king. On May 19, 1217, a great battle was fought, in which the French army was totally routed. After this, Lewis met with such bad success, that he was obliged to sue for peace, and so a treaty was concluded on Sept. 11, whereby it was agreed, that all who had sided with him should be restored to whatever rights and privileges they enjoyed before the troubles, and Lewis renounced all manner of pretensions to England; soon after which he set sail for France, leaving Henry in full possession of the kingdom. Affairs being thus happily settled, the regent, to give a further satisfaction to the minds of the people, sent positive orders to all the sheriffs to see the two charters of king John punctually observed; which not having all the effect he intended, he sent itinerant justices into all the counties, to see the strict observance of them: but, to the great grief of the kingdom, he was taken off by death, 1219. After the death of the earl of Pembroke, the government, during the king's minority, was committed to the bishop of Winchester, who was made regent; and Hubert de Berrg, who had defended Dover, was made justiciary. In 1221, the new building of Westminster-abbey was begun, king Henry himself laying the first stone. The same year Joanna, the king's sister, was married to Alexander II. king of Scotland, and Hubert de Berrg married to Alexander's eldest sister. Hubert de Berrg got the ascendancy with the king his master over the bishop of Winchester, and so insinuated himself into the royal favour, that he rose to an exorbitant degree of power, which he exercised in a most illegal and arbitrary manner. Though he was in effect prime minister, yet, as the bishop of Winchester, who was appointed regent by the parliament, was, by his office, superior to him, he contrived to get him removed. Lewis VIII. king of France, who succeeded his father Philip, broke the peace with the English, 1224, and confiscated all the territories they held in France. Upon this a parliament was called, and a 15th upon moveables was granted, on condition the charter of king John was strictly observed for the future. The king promised, but took little care to perform. With the money he raised an army, and sent it to Guienne; but we do not find that it made any great progress there. In 1226, the parliament declared the king at age, though he was not yet so old as the law required, which was twenty-one: after which he obliged all those who had charters to renew them, in order to raise money to fill his coffers. Hubert de Berrg wholly governed him, he having got the king to distress the bishop of Winchester, and to send him to his diocese. The king began to lose the affections of his people. What most contributed to it was his annulling, all of a sudden the two charters of the king his father, which he had solemnly sworn to observe, pretending he was not bound by what he had promised in his minority; and, having spent the winter in extorting great sums of money from his subjects, the spring following, 1229, went over with his army into France, and returned again into England, having, through his neglect, effected nothing. In 1233, the king demanded a subsidy of the parliament, for the payment of his debts contracted on account of his expeditions against France: but had the mortification to be refused, as so ill a use had been made of the money that had been granted him. A general odium being raised against Hubert de Berrg, the king was prevailed on to dismiss him. But the bishop of Winchester, who was now prime minister, humouring the passions and inclinations of the king, acquired an exorbitant power, which he made a worse use of than even Hubert de Berrg himself. He represented to the king that the barons were too powerful, and that they wanted to make themselves independent; and that the only way to repress them, was to send for a number of foreigners, and give them the places the barons held; and accordingly he invited over great numbers of Poitevins, his countrymen. This exasperated the barons; who, upon the king's summoning them to parliament, instead of meeting according to the summons, sent deputies to him, to acquaint him, that if he did not remove the Bishop of Winchester and the Poitevins, they were resolved to set another prince upon the throne, who should govern according to law. The king endeavoured to reduce them by force of arms; but some of them breaking the confederacy, left the rest to his resentment. The earl of Pembroke retired into Wales, and being assisted by prince Lewellyn, he routed the royal army, and Henry retired to Gloucester; upon which the bishop of Winchester procured an order to be signed in council, and sent to the governors of Ireland, to plunder the estates of the earl of Pembroke, promising they should have more estates for their pains. This had the desired effect; it drew the earl over thither, where in a battle he was treacherously stabbed in the back. However, by the representations of the archbishop of Canterbury to the king, the bishop was disgraced and sent to his diocese, and his creatures turned out, and ordered to give an account of their actions, and of the money that had passed through their hands; but they took sanctuary in churches. This was in 1234. In 1236 the bishop went to Rome, and died 1238. In 1236, king Henry married Eleanor, second daughter to Raymond earl of Provence. He now gave himself wholly up to the direction of the queen's relations, and other foreigners, their adherents, loading them with gifts, pensions, &c. which, together with the grievances occasioned by this measure, was the cause of perpetual disputes and misunderstandings between the king and his parliament, for near 30 years, and ended at last in a civil war, called the barons' war. In 1239, the queen was delivered of a prince, who was named Edward. The pope had so great an ascendancy, that in 1240 he nominated 300 Italians to the vacant benefices. In 1245, the queen was delivered of another son, who was named Edmund. The court of Rome continuing its exactions, the parliament, in 1246, in letters signed by the king, the bishops, and the barons, laid before the pope their grievances; but met with no redress. About this time died Isabella, queen dowager of England, and countess of March; for she married the earl of March after king John's death. In 1248, the king demanded a new subsidy from his parliament, which they refused; and upon their representing to him their grievances on account of the foreigners, he dissolved them, for fear of their proceeding to more vigorous measures; and to supply his wants, he was forced to sell his plate and jewels, which being quickly purchased by the citizens of London, who always pleaded poverty, when the granting him any aid was in question, he, in resentment, set up a fair in Westminster, to last 15 days; during which the Londoners were commanded to shut up their shops; and all fairs, that used to be kept at that time, were prohibited all over England. Henry very impolitically fell out with Simon de Montfort, who had married his sister, and was made earl of Leicester: in a great passion he called the earl a traitor; upon which he, in a passion also, told the king, he lied; and that if he were not a king, he would make him eat his words. However, the king was obliged to conceal that resentment which burned within him. The barons now began to exert themselves, and in a parliament held at Oxford, 1258, the confederacy was so strong against the king, (the barons coming well attended and well armed) that they compelled him in effect to lay down the sovereign authority, and to lodge it in 24 commissioners, 12 to be chosen by the king, and 12 by the barons, Simon de Montfort to be their president; who drew up some articles called The Provisions of Oxford, in favour of the barons, which the king and prince Edward were obliged to swear to the observance of, in consequence of which the foreigners were obliged to leave the kingdom. Henry got himself absolved from his oath by the pope; and, in 1261, declared in parliament he no longer looked upon himself obliged to observe these regulations. In 1263, the war broke out between the two parties, the barons having chosen the earl of Leicester for their general. On May 14, 1264, was fought the famous battle of Lewes, in which the royal army was routed: king Henry, and his brother Richard, king of the Romans, were taken prisoners; as were also prince Edward (who had beaten the Londoners in the first attack) and Henry son to the king of the Romans. And now the barons drew up a new plan of government, which was confirmed by the parliament, which met June 22. Things continued in this situation about a year; but prince Edward having the good fortune to escape from his confinement, raised a considerable army, and first attacked young Montfort, who was conducting some forces to his father, and then advancing immediately against the earl, in an obstinate and bloody fight, on Aug. 4, 1265, totally routed Leicester's army, and set the king his father at liberty, the earl himself and his son Henry being slain on the spot. King Henry now confiscated the estates of the confederate barons, and severely chastised the city of London. In 1271, prince Edward having settled the affairs of the king, undertook an expedition to the Holy Land, where he signalized himself by many acts of valour. Henry died at Bury St. Edmunds, Nov. 16, 1272, having reigned 56 years and 20 days, aged 64, and was interred in the abbey church of Westminster, near the shrine of Edward the Confessor, which was removed thither, 1269, just as the church (the most stately then in Europe) was finished. He had nine children, whereof only two sons, Edward and Edmund, and two daughters, Margaret and Beatrix, survived him. Trial by fire and water ordeal was by the king's command laid aside by the judges, and soon after grew quite out of use. Henry was of a middle size and robust make, and his countenance had a peculiar cast from his left eyelid, which hung down so far as to cover part of his eye. The particulars of his character may be gathered from the detail of his conduct. He was certainly a prince of very mean talents: irresolute, inconstant, and capricious; proud, insolent, and arbitrary; arrogant in prosperity, and abject in adversity; profuse, rapacious, and choleric, though destitute of liberality, economy, and courage. Yet his continence was praise-worthy, as well as his aversion to cruelty; for he contented himself with punishing the rebels in their effects, when he might have glutted his revenge with their blood. He was prodigal to excess, and therefore always in necessity. Notwithstanding the great sums he levied from his subjects, and though his occasions were never so pressing, he could not help squandering away his money upon worthless favourites, without considering the difficulty he always found in obtaining supplies from parliament.

HENRY IV. duke of Lancaster and Hereford, surnamed of Bolingbroke, from his being born there, was the eldest son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and ascended the throne upon the forced resignation of Richard II. and was crowned Oct. 13, 1399. The parliament meeting the day after the coronation, first passed an act of indemnity in favour of those who had taken arms for the king whilst only duke of Lancaster. The king also published a general pardon, excepting, however, the murderers of the duke of Gloucester. The parliament also passed an act settling the succession in the house of Lancaster. This might not have produced any ill consequence, as Mortimer earl of March and his brother died without issue, had not the second son of the duke of York married Anne their sister; which at length proved the source of that long and bloody contest between the houses of York and Lancaster. The convocation being sitting at the same time with the parliament, Henry, in order to gain the clergy to his side, sent to assure them, that he would maintain them in all their privileges and immunities, and was ready to join with them in extirpating heresy, and punishing obstinate heretics. And to preserve the esteem of the rest of his subjects, he caused all the bonds which Richard had extorted, as well from the city of London as from the 17 counties, to be brought into Chancery and publicly burnt. In the year 1400 a conspiracy broke out against the king, which was suppressed, and the chief conspirators were put to death; and soon after, the late king was assassinated. About the time of the late conspiracy, Owen Glendour got the Welsh to renounce their subjection to England, and to own him for their sovereign: from which time he styled himself prince of Wales, and maintained his authority there for some years. He made an incursion into Herefordshire, and took Mortimer earl of March prisoner, for which king Henry was not sorry. The king marched against Glendour; but, he always retiring to the mountains of Snowden, it was not possible to come at him. In 1401, the parliament enlarged the statute of premunire, which gave a great blow to the pope's power in England; and yet an act was obtained, by the influence of the court and the intrigues of the clergy, this session, for the burning of heretics, occasioned by the great increase of the Wickliffites, or Lollards. One William Sawtre, a Lollard, parish-priest of St. Osith, in London, was immediately after that condemned by the ecclesiastical court; and, being delivered over to the secular power, was burnt alive by virtue of the king's writ, (called the writ De heretico comburendo,) directed to the mayor and sheriffs of London. In 1402, the king married Joan of Navarre, widow of the duke of Bretagne, but he had no issue by her. This year the Scotch invaded England twice, and were both times defeated by the earl of Northumberland, and Henry Hotspur his son. In 1403, a conspiracy broke out, at the head of which was the earl of Northumberland, who was disgusted at the king's refusing to let him have the ransom of the Scotch prisoners of distinction. He engaged Owen Glendour in it, and it was agreed to dethrone Henry, and place the crown on the head of Mortimer. The king marched against them, and a battle was fought near Shrewsbury, where the king gained a complete victory. Another conspiracy broke out, in which was embarked Richard Scroop, archbishop of York, whom Richard II. had raised to that dignity, with several of the nobility; but this was entirely suppressed, 1408. To return to the civil government: in 1406, an act was passed to secure the freedom of election of members of parliament, which gives room to suppose the king had done something inconsistent with such freedom. However, he gave his assent to this act, for the sake of a subsidy he wanted. When the demand was made, the parliament told him, there was no apparent necessity for it; but in order to obtain it, he kept them so long sitting, that they were obliged to consent to it for their own convenience. He did the same in 1410, when he rejected the petition of the commons, for repealing or altering the late barbarous act against the Lollards; and, to shew how averse he was to relax any thing in this point, caused one Thos. Badby to be burnt, who was the second who suffered death on account of Wickliffe's opinions. In the mean time, the prince of Wales suffered himself to be so much debauched by evil companions, that he gave himself up to riotous and disorderly practices; one of his companions being arraigned for felony, he resolved to be present at the trial; and while sentence was passing, in a great passion he struck the judge on the face, who immediately ordered him to be arrested, and committed to the King's Bench. The prince hereupon relenting, suffered himself to be led quietly to prison. King Henry died March 20, 1413, in the 46th year of his age, and 14th of his reign. His actions had very little worthy or eminent in them; one thing, at least, has fixed an indelible stain on his memory, viz. his being the first burner of heretics. There was, in his reign, a dreadful plague in London, which swept away above 30,000 persons. Henry had by Mary de Bohun, his first wife, daughter of Humphrey, earl of Hereford, four sons, viz. Henry, who succeeded him; Thomas, duke of Clarence; John, duke of Bedford; and Humphrey, duke of Gloucester: and two daughters; Blanch, married to the elector palatine; and Philippa, to the king of Denmark. Henry IV. was of the middle stature, well proportioned, and perfect in all the exercises of arms and chivalry; his countenance was severe rather than serene; and his disposition sour, sullen, and reserved: he possessed a great share of courage, fortitude, and penetration; was naturally imperious, though he bridled his temper with caution; superstitious, though without the least tincture of virtue and true religion; and meanly parsimonious, though justly censured for want of economy, and ill-judged profusion. He was tame from caution, humble from fear, cruel from policy, and rapacious from indigence. He rose to the throne by perfidy and treason; established his authority in the blood of his subjects; and died a penitent for his sins, because he could no longer enjoy the fruits of his transgression. During this reign, William of Wickham, bishop of Winchester, Sir Robert Knolles, and Richard Whittington, mayor of London, distinguished themselves for their works of charity and public foundation. Geoffrey Chaucer and John Gower rendered themselves famous for their poetry, and are looked upon as the first reformers of the English language.

HENRY V. surnamed Henry of Monmouth, ascended the throne upon the death of his father, Henry IV. and was proclaimed March 20, 1413, and crowned April 9, following: after which, the first thing he did was to send for his old companions, whom he exhorted in a very pathetic manner to forsake their evil courses; and, making them handsome presents, charged them at the same time, on pain of his displeasure, never to come to court. He then chose a council of the greatest and ablest of his subjects, turned out such judges as had abused their authority, continued the deserving, particularly the chief justice Gascoigne, who had committed him for his insult in court, when prince of Wales, and filled up the places of those he had removed with persons of the like honour and integrity. He did also the same with respect to inferior magistrates. The greatest blot in his character was, his persecuting the Wickliffites, or Lollards. But that was more owing to the superstition of the times, than to his own natural temper; he often expressing a dislike to such proceedings. Sir John Oldcastle, baron of Cobham, who was looked upon as the chief protector of the Lollards, was the first of the nobility who suffered on account of religion. Henry, as soon as he mounted the throne, began to think of recovering what the English had lost in France: and there being great dissensions in that kingdom, Henry had laid hold of that opportunity, and sent ambassadors to demand Normandy, &c. and all that had been yielded to Edward III. by the treaty of Bretagne. The negotiations went on without any hopes of an accommodation; and when Henry was just going to embark, a plot was discovered against his person, for which the earl of Cambridge, the lord treasurer Scroop, and Thomas Grey, a privy counsellor, were executed. It is thought they were bribed by French gold to carry on this conspiracy. This affair being over, he embarked with his troops in August 1415, landed on the 21st at Havre de Grace in Normandy, and then besieged and took Harfleur; and, resolving to march to Calais, he crossed the Somme, October 9, where the French army under the constable d'Albert, four times as numerous as the English, were waiting to give him battle, in full confidence of victory. David Gam, a Welsh captain, being sent to view their situation, on his return said, "there were enough to kill, enough to take prisoners, and enough to run away." The king was not a little pleased with this Welshman's report. Henry, after exhorting his men to put their trust in God, the giver of victory, attacked the French. The battle began at ten in the morning, and lasted till five in the afternoon, October 25, 1415, when, by the surprising courage and conduct of the king, and the bravery of his troops, the whole numerous French army, said to consist of more than 100,000 men, was entirely defeated. The constable d'Albert, the duke of Alençon, with several other princes and great men, and 10,000 private men, were slain. Among the prisoners, who were very numerous, were the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and many persons of distinction. The English lost only the duke of York, and the earl of Suffolk, a few knights, and 400 private men. The king immediately returned thanks to God for the victory. This was called the battle of Agincourt, from a castle of that name near the field of battle. The civil wars raged more than ever in France; Henry went over in July, 1417, and made great progress; and, in the beginning of the year 1419, Rouen surrendered. And now all Normandy was again fallen under the dominion of the English, except a few castles, 215 years after it had been taken from them in the reign of king John. Henry also surprised and took Pontoise, which opened him a way to the very gates of Paris. At last a treaty was concluded at Troyes on May 21, 1420, whereby it was agreed, that Henry should marry the princess Catharine, that he should be regent of the kingdom during king Charles's life, (who being frequently afflicted with fits of lunacy, was incapable of governing,) and that, after his death, the crown of France should descend to the king of England and his heirs for ever. Henry hereupon espoused the princess Catharine, and the marriage was solemnized on the 30th of May. In February 1421, Henry arrived in England with his queen, who was crowned a few days after. The parliament, which met in May, granted the king a subsidy for carrying on the war against the dauphin; but at the same time, in a petition they presented, told him, that the conquest of France proved the ruin of England. In June the king returned to France, and forced the dauphin to raise the siege of Chartres, took Dreux, and in October laid siege to Meux, which was not wholly subjected till May following; about which time, queen Catharine arrived from England, and the two courts kept their Whitsun-holidays together at Paris, in a magnificent manner. Afterwards, Henry marched against the dauphin, fell sick by the way, and died at Vincennes, Aug. 31, 1422, in the 31st year of his age, and 10th of his reign. He had by his queen Catharine only one son, Henry, born March 6, 1421, at Windsor. Henry V. was tall and slender, with a long neck, an engaging aspect, and limbs of the most elegant turn. He excelled all the youth of that age in agility, and the exercise of arms; was hardy, patient, laborious, and more capable of enduring cold, hunger, and fatigue, than any individual in his army. His valour was such as no danger could startle, and no difficulty oppose; nor was his policy inferior to his courage. He managed the dissensions among his enemies with such address as spoke him consummate in the arts of the cabinet. He fomented their jealousies, and converted their mutual resentment to his own advantage. Henry possessed a self-taught genius, that blazed out at once without the aid of instruction or experience; and a fund of natural sagacity, that made ample amends for these defects. He was chaste, temperate, modest, and devout, scrupulously just in his administration, and severely exact in the discipline of his army, upon which he knew his glory and success in a great measure depended. In a word, it must be owned he was without an equal in the art of war, policy, and government.

HENRY VI. was scarce 9 months old when he succeeded his father Henry V. Dec. 6, 1422. He was immediately proclaimed not only king of England, but heir of France, pursuant to the treaty of Troyes; and, upon the death of Charles V. who died in less than two months after, the duke of Bedford, uncle to the infant king, ordered him to be proclaimed king of France, at Paris, according to the same treaty; and took upon himself the regency of that kingdom, as the late king his brother had desired, when near his end. On the other hand, the dauphin, as soon as he heard of his father's death, caused himself to be proclaimed king of France, and was crowned in November at Poitiers. On Nov. 9, the parliament met (when the queen sat among the lords, with the royal infant in her lap,) to settle the government during the king's minority; and John, duke of Bedford, was appointed protector of the kingdom; and Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, and Henry, bishop of Winchester, his governors. I shall pass over the transactions of the regency, during the minority of the king, and shall only mention what he was immediately concerned in. The duke of Bedford, thinking it might be of service to have Henry crowned in France, having been first crowned in England, on Nov. 6, 1429, he went over to Paris, and was crowned there at the end of the following year, and returned to England in Jan. 1432, being then 10 years old. In 1437, died Catharine of France, king Henry's mother, and widow of Henry V. After the death of that prince, she married Owen Tudor, a Welsh gentleman; from this marriage sprung Henry earl of Richmond, king of England, under the name of Henry VII. In 1444, a truce was concluded at Tours between England and France, which was prolonged to 1449. Soon after the commencement of the truce, king Henry married Margaret of Anjou, who arrived in England 1445; and she and her favourites managed the king just as they pleased; this caused great uneasiness among the people, which Charles took the advantage of; for, upon the duke of Somerset, then regent, refusing to give the satisfaction he demanded for Tongres being surprised by Surienne, governor of the Lower Normandy, for the English, 1448, whilst the truce subsisted, he fell upon Normandy with four armies at once, and reduced it before the end of Aug. 1450. Guienne followed the fate of Normandy, after having been in possession of the English 300 years; and nothing remained to the English in 1453, of all their vast acquisitions in France, but only Calais and Guienne. England was now in a distracted condition: there were two parties in the court, one the duke of Gloucester's, the other the cardinal of Winchester's; with whom were joined Kemp, archbishop of York, and William de la Pole, earl, and afterwards marquis and duke of Suffolk. The duke of Gloucester was exceedingly beloved by the people; but the cardinal got the better of him in the council, and in the king's confidence, in which the duke of Gloucester lost ground every day. They first removed him from the council-board; and then a parliament being summoned at St. Edmundsbury, which met in 1447, the duke was arrested and closely confined, under colour that he designed to kill the king and seize the crown, though nobody believed a word of the matter. The next morning he was found dead in his bed, people making no doubt but he was murdered. The cardinal died about a month after, and left the world and his immense riches with as much reluctance as ever any one did. And now the queen and Suffolk governed all in the king's name, and none but their creatures were employed in the administration. The universal hatred of the people against them made the duke of York begin to think of asserting his claim to the crown. In 1450, the commons so pursued the duke of Suffolk, that the queen, in order to save him, found herself under a necessity to have him banished; but in his passage to France, being met by an English man of war, the captain without any ceremony ordered his head to be cut off. He was succeeded in the queen's confidence by Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerset, almost as odious to the people as Suffolk had been. The duke of York at first proceeded with great caution; and as an essay how the people stood affected, he instituted one Jack Cade, under the name of John Mortimer, to raise a rebellion in Kent, where he drew together great numbers under pretence of reforming the government; and became so strong, that he cut in pieces a detachment of the king's army, and entered London in triumph, the city opening her gates to him; but, being deserted by his followers, he was taken and slain. At length, the duke of York having concerted measures with his friends, especially Richard Nevil, earl of Salisbury, and the earl of Warwick, the war broke out between the two houses of Lancaster and York, the former having for their device the red rose, and the latter the white rose; and whole torrents of English blood were spilt in this contest. The first battle was fought near St. Alban's May 31, 1455, when the royal army was totally routed, with the loss of 5000 men. The duke of Somerset and several other nobles and great men were slain, and the king himself taken prisoner. York affected to treat him with great respect, and was appointed protector of the realm. He left the king and queen at full liberty; the consequence of which was, he was dismissed from his protectorship, and he and his friends retired from court. After this there was a reconciliation between the two parties; but, as it was not sincere, the quarrel soon broke out again. In 1459, the earl of Salisbury defeated the king's troops commanded by lord Audley, and killed 2400, together with Audley himself and his principal officers, at Bloreheath, in Shropshire. On July 6, 1460, the earl of March, eldest son of the duke of York, gained a complete victory at Northampton, killing 10,000 royalists. The king was again taken prisoner, and the queen with the prince of Wales retired into Scotland. And now a parliament was called, which the duke of York expected would offer him the crown. Being disappointed, he sent them a memorial asserting his claim; but all that the parliament did, was to resolve, that Henry should enjoy the crown during his life, after which it should devolve on the duke of York and his heirs. In the mean time, the duke of York was absolute master of the government, and of the king's person. The queen had drawn together an army of 18,000 men; the duke of York marched against her with only 5000, expecting to be joined by his son the earl of March; but before he could come up, the duke was attacked by the queen's forces, near Wakefield in Yorkshire, December 31, 1460, his army put to flight, he himself slain, and his head fixed upon the walls of York, where the earl of Salisbury's soon accompanied it, he having been taken and beheaded at Pontefract. The earl of Rutland, the duke's second son, about 12 years old, was taken in the flight, and cruelly slain by lord Clifford. Notwithstanding this discouragement, the earl of March marched with his army, and defeated Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, at Mortimer's Cross in Herefordshire; and though the queen got the better of the earl of Warwick at Bernard's heath, near St. Alban's, and freed the king her husband, yet the earl of March coming up with a great army, and being joined by the remains of the earl of Warwick's, she retired into the North; and the earl entered London, as it were, in triumph, and was, by the management of the earl of Warwick, proclaimed king, by the title of Edward IV. For the conclusion, see the life of king Edward IV. Henry VI. without any princely virtue or qualification, was totally free from cruelty and revenge; on the contrary, he could not, without reluctance, consent to the punishment of those malefactors who were sacrificed to the public safety; and frequently sustained personal indignities of the grossest nature, without discovering the least mark of resentment. He was chaste, pious, compassionate, and charitable. In a word, he would have adorned a cloister, though he disgraced a crown; was rather respectable for those vices he wanted, than for the virtues he possessed. He founded the college of Eton, near Windsor, and King's college, in Cambridge, for the reception of those scholars who had begun their studies at Eton.

HENRY VII. earl of Richmond, was the son of Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret, descended from a bastard son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, by Catharine Rowet or Swinford, mistress, afterwards wife, to that prince. Immediately after the victory of Bosworth, the earl caused Te Deum to be sung, and his whole army to fall on their knees, to return God thanks, after which they saluted him with unanimous and repeated shouts of "Long live king Henry!" from which time he took upon himself the style and authority of king. An extraordinary kind of distemper raged about this time in England, particularly in London, called the sweating sickness, because it threw persons into a profuse sweat, and carried them off in 24 hours; but those who got over that time usually recovered. It continued from the middle of September to the 8th of October, and swept away great numbers of people. Two mayors and 6 aldermen of London died of it within eight days. On October 30, 1485, Henry was crowned. At the same time, he appointed a band of 50 men to attend him, called yeomen of the guard. The parliament met on November 7, and passed an act, that the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in the king, and the heirs of his body; and then reversed the attainders of those who had taken part with the king, whilst only earl of Richmond. On January 18, 1486, he married the princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV. to the great joy of the people. On September 20, the queen was delivered of a prince, who was named Arthur. Henry behaved with great coldness to his queen, and on all occasions shewed his great aversion to the whole York party, looking upon that house to be his rivals; which partiality bred a great deal of ill blood, and was the source of most of the troubles which afflicted his reign. A rumour being raised, that the duke of York, one of Edward's sons, was yet alive, having by some means or other escaped his uncle's cruel design, the people readily gave into it. And this gave occasion to Richard Simon, a priest at Oxford, to set up one Lambert Simnell, a baker's son, and student under him, and impose him upon the world for the said duke. However, a report being soon spread, that the earl of Warwick had escaped out of the Tower, which, though false, caused great joy among the people: Simon now judged it best to instruct his pupil to personate that earl, and Ireland was judged the most proper place to open the first scene in; where he was received with joy, and proclaimed, at Dublin, king of England and lord of Ireland, by the name of Edward VI. King Henry now confined the queen his mother-in-law, widow of Edward IV. to Bermondsey monastery in Southwark, and seized all her estates; and there she remained as long as she lived. Another step the king took, was to shew the true earl of Warwick to the people. The duchess dowager of Burgundy sent over into Ireland, in May 1487, 2000 German veterans; presently after which the sham king was crowned with great solemnity.

Then the new king, and the German and Irish forces, came over into England. King Henry fell upon them, June 16, near Newark-upon-Trent, and totally routed them. Simnell was taken prisoner, with the priest his master. Henry gave Simnell his life, employed him first about his kitchen, and then made him one of his falconers, in which post he remained till his death. And now Henry filled his coffers by confiscating the estates of divers persons, under pretence of their favouring the late conspiracy. He thought it necessary at last to have the queen crowned, which was performed on November 25, almost two years after the marriage. In June, 1492, prince Henry was born. About this time, the duchess of Burgundy began to play off the second Simnell. This was Peter Peterkin, or Perkin Warbeck, son of a converted Jew, of Tournay, who had lived a considerable time in London, who personated the duke of York. He was sent to Portugal, afterwards to Ireland; and the king of France, being told the duke of York was in Ireland, sent for him, lodged him in his palace, and appointed him a guard; but when Charles was upon making peace with England, he sent Perkin away. Several great men in England favoured the plot, which being discovered, some of them suffered death. King Henry sent Sir Edward Poyning to Ireland as his deputy, 1494, who holding a parliament, an act was passed called Poyning's law, whereby all the statutes of England, relating to the public, were to be of force in Ireland. In 1495, Perkin embarked for England, and landing some of his men on the coast of Kent, to see how the people stood affected, the Kentish men presently took up arms, and cut to pieces those who were landed, except about 150, who being taken prisoners, were all hanged by order of the king. Upon this, Perkin sailed back to Flanders. The king, having a subsidy granted, 1497, to revenge the insult of the king of Scotland, who had twice invaded England the year before with Perkin, it was raised with so much rigour, that it caused an insurrection in Cornwall; the malecontents marched to Blackheath, where the king attacked and totally defeated them, killing 2000 on the spot. L. Audley their general, Flammock, and Joseph, the chiefs of the rebels, were taken and executed; the rest were pardoned. A peace was soon after concluded between the two monarchs. King James would not deliver up Perkin Warbeck, but honourably dismissed him and his wife, and by their own desire sent them into Ireland, before the conclusion of the treaty. Charles VII. king of France, died in April, 1498, and was succeeded by Lewis XII. About this time there was an insurrection in Cornwall, in favour of Perkin Warbeck, who came from Ireland to head the malecontents there; but his army of about 6000 men, upon the news of the king's advancing, submitted themselves; who pardoned them all, except a few ringleaders. Perkin, after having been exposed in an ignominious manner, was sent to the Tower; where he, plotting his escape together with the earl of Warwick, was hanged: and the earl, but 24 years old, and who had been prisoner from the beginning of this reign, was beheaded on Tower-hill, November 1499. In 1500, the plague raged in England, particularly in London, where 30,000 died of it. In 1501, Catharine of Spain was married to Arthur prince of Wales. The prince died about five months after his marriage, April 2, 1502, in the 17th year of his age; and some time after, the king created Henry his second son prince of Wales, who, upon his father's death, succeeded to the crown. In 1503, Elizabeth, Henry's queen, died. At this time, the king grievously oppressed his subjects, by means of two infamous ministers, Empson and Dudley, two lawyers. The avarice of Henry put him on projecting the marriage of Catharine, his son Arthur's widow, with his other son Henry, rather than part with that princess's dowry, which was 200,000 crowns of gold; and a dispensation was obtained from the pope; so Henry married his brother's widow, though the marriage was not consummated till after the king came to the crown. The king's eldest daughter Margaret was about the same time married to James IV. king of Scotland; from her descended our king James I. King Henry, finding he drew near his end, granted a general pardon, and ordered by his will, that his successor should make good what his ministers had unjustly extorted from the people. He died at Richmond, April 22, 1509, in the 52d year of his age, and 24th of his reign. Henry was tall, straight, and well shaped, though slender; of a grave aspect and saturnine complexion; austere in address, and reserved in conversation, except when he had a favourite point to carry; and then he could fawn, flatter, and practise all the arts of insinuation. He inherited a natural fund of sagacity, which was improved by study and experience; nor was he deficient in personal bravery, or political courage. He was cool, close, cunning, dark, distrustful, and designing; and of all the princes who sat upon the English throne, the most sordid, selfish, and ignoble. The nobility he excluded entirely from the administration of public affairs, and employed clergymen and lawyers, who, as they had no interest in the nation, and depended upon his favour, were more obsequious to his will, and ready to concur in all his arbitrary measures. At the same time it must be owned he was a wise legislator, chaste, temperate, assiduous in the exercise of religious duties, decent in his deportment, and exact in the administration of justice, when his own private interest was not concerned; though he frequently used religion and justice as cloaks for perfidy and oppression. In this reign was built a large ship of war called the Great Harry, which cost 14,000*l*. This was properly speaking the first ship in the English navy. Before this period, when the king wanted a fleet, he had no other expedient than to hire ships from the merchants.

HENRY VIII. succeeded his father Henry VII. at the age of 19 years, on April 22, 1509, and in his person united the two houses of Lancaster and York. At the beginning of his reign he made an example of those two hated ministers, Empson and Dudley; but, as it was difficult to condemn them without straining a point, with so much nicety had they acted their villany, though they had been condemned and sentenced to die for conspiring against the king and state, an act of attainder passed at the meeting of the parliament against them, and they were beheaded on Tower-hill. The king's marriage with Catharine of Arragon, relict of his brother Arthur, was solemnized the beginning of June, as was the coronation of both king and queen on the 24th of the same month. About this time, Fox, bishop of Winchester, introduced to court Thomas Wolsey, a clergyman, as a fit person to serve the king. Though Henry had just concluded a new treaty of alliance with Lewis XII. yet he was drawn into a war, under pretence of the recovery of Guienne, by pope Julius II. and Ferdinand the Catholic, king of Arragon, the queen's father; though his mind was chiefly bent on his pleasures, in which he was so extravagant, that he squandered away 1,800,000*l*. which his father had with so much anxiety hoarded up. This war was opposed by some of the council, and one of them expressed himself to this purpose—"Let us leave off our attempts against the terra firma; the natural situation of islands seems not to sort with contests of that kind: England is alone a just empire; or, when we enlarge ourselves, let it be that way we can, and to which, it seems, the eternal Providence has destined us; and that is by sea." By the treaty concluded 1511, Henry was to send over 6000 men; and Ferdinand, for the same purpose, obliged himself to furnish 500 men at arms, 1500 light horse, and 4000 foot; though they never effected any thing further than giving Ferdinand an opportunity of conquering Navarre, and keeping the French out of Italy. Henry, though he saw how he had been imposed on, yet he suffered himself to be drawn into a second league against France, by the pope, the emperor Maximilian, and king Ferdinand, who all had their separate views, and made use of Henry to bring them about. Having sent the best part of his troops over to Calais before him, he arrived there on June 30, 1513, and returned to England in October, having made a successful campaign. While Henry was abroad, James IV. of Scotland, broke through all his alliances with him, and invaded Northumberland with an army of 60,000 men, taking Norham castle, and several other places. The earl of Surry, with 26,000 men, engaged the Scots army at Flodden, Sept. 9, and, after a most bloody and obstinate battle, in which several thousands were killed on both sides, obtained a complete victory. The Scotch king was never seen after the battle, so that doubtless he fell in it. Among the slain were also one Scotch archbishop, two bishops, four abbots, and 17 barons; whereas the English lost not one person of note. In 1514, Thomas Wolsey, then prime minister, was made archbishop of York; and, some time after, Leo X. sent him a cardinal's hat. In August, 1514, a treaty of peace was concluded between Lewis XII. and king Henry, one article of which was, the marriage of Lewis with the princess Mary, which accordingly was solemnized at Abbeville in October. Lewis dying in less than three months after the marriage, about two months after the queen dowager took for her second husband Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk. On February 11, 1516, queen Catharine was delivered of a princess, named Mary, who was afterwards queen of England. In 1517, the sweating sickness raged again in England more violently than at the beginning of the last reign. At this time Luther began to write against indulgences. In 1521, Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, was beheaded; he was the last high constable of England. The same year Henry wrote a book against Luther, Of the seven Sacraments, &c. It was presented to pope Leo X. in full consistory, who, for this service done the church, bestowed on Henry and his successors the title of Defender of the Faith. This title being afterwards confirmed by parliament, the kings of England have borne it ever since. The same year was remarkable for the invention of muskets. Henry having entered into an alliance with France, Wolsey, (without troubling the parliament) issued out orders in the king's name, for levying a sixth part upon the goods and estates of the laity, and a fourth upon those of the clergy. This threw the whole nation into a ferment, and had like to have raised a rebellion; upon which the king disavowed the orders, and left the whole blame to fall on the cardinal. In 1530, cardinal Wolsey was arrested by the earl of Northumberland, for high treason, and died as they were conducting him to London. Toward the end of the year 1532, the king privately married Ann Boleyn; and the next year, 1533, an act was passed, forbidding all appeals to Rome, on pain of incurring a premunire. The king's marriage with Boleyn was made public: and Dr. Cranmer, having been made archbishop of Canterbury upon the death of archbishop Warham, the judgment of the convocation of both provinces having been first obtained, pronounced the sentence of divorce between king Henry and Catharine of Arragon, on May 23, and confirmed his second marriage; which done, the new queen was crowned on June 1. Catharine died in 1536. The pope published a sentence declaring Henry's marriage with Catharine good and lawful, requiring him to take her again, and denouncing censures in case of a refusal; in return to which, when the parliament met, the beginning of the year 1534, an act was passed for abolishing the pope's power in England, with Peterpence, procurations, delegations, expedition of bulls, and dispensations coming from the court of Rome. The same act declared the king's marriage with Catharine null and void, and his marriage with Ann Boleyn valid, settling the succession of the crown upon their issue. In the next session the parliament confirmed the king's title of Supreme Head of the Church, and passed several other acts against the pope. And shortly after a proclamation was issued out against giving the bishop of Rome the name of Pope, and for erasing it out of all books, that, if possible, no remembrance of it might remain. Pope Clement VII. died during this rupture, and was succeeded by Paul III. In 1535, the king ordered a general visitation of the religious houses, and Cromwell was appointed visitor-general; and shocking scenes of debauchery, lewdness, and impiety, were discovered, as well as the frauds made use of in respect to relics and images to impose on the deluded people; which ended in their suppression. Great quantities of these images, together with the pretended relics of saints, were publicly burnt by the king's order; and, among the rest, the bones of Thomas Becket, whose costly shrine was seized for the king's use. The number of monasteries suppressed from first to last were 643, together with 90 colleges, 2374 chantries, 3 chapels, and 110 hospitals. Their yearly value, as given in before the suppression, when the rents were low, because the fines upon the leases were high, was 152,517*l.* but their real value was supposed to be above a million. Besides this, the plate, furniture, and other effects, were of a prodigious value, which all fell into the king's hands. King Henry allowed small pensions to several of the abbots, monks, and nuns, sold the abbey lands to his subjects at easy rates, and applied part of the revenue of these houses towards founding the new bishoprics of Chester, Gloucester, Peterborough, Oxford, Bristol, and Westminster, which last ceased to be a bishopric after its first bishop. The order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem was soon after entirely suppressed. The king had been married to Ann Boleyn but about three years, when he began to be jealous of her, which ended in her ruin. At the same time he was in love with Jane Seymour, which doubtless made him more willing to entertain disadvantageous thoughts of the queen; and the popish party might possibly take advantage of the disposition the king was in, to complete her destruction. However, she was accused of a criminal familiarity with her own brother the earl of Rochford, and four of her domestics, who were all executed, and, after all, the queen was beheaded on the Green within the Tower, on May 19, 1536. The very next day the king married Jane Seymour, who bore him prince Edward, his successor; but his birth, in the following year, cost the queen her life. Queen Anne's marriage was annulled on pretence of a pre-contract with the lord Percy; and her daughter Elizabeth, as well as Mary, the daughter of Catharine, were illegitimated by act of parliament. In 1539, by the counsels of Gardiner and others of the popish party, an act passed in parliament, which made it burning or hanging for any one to deny transubstantiation, to maintain the necessity of communion of both kinds, that it was lawful for priests to marry, that vows of chastity may be broken, that private masses are unprofitable, or that auricular confession is not necessary to salvation. This act was deservedly called the bloody act. In January 1540, the king married Anne, sister to the duke of Cleves. He disliked her at first sight, swearing they had brought him over a Flanders mare: but for political reasons he married her. But his aversion to her continuing, he got himself divorced from her in about six months after. Cromwell had the chief hand in this match, and the king never forgave him for it, though he afterwards created him earl of Essex. He did not enjoy this new title long; for the popish party, taking advantage of the king's displeasure towards him, found means to work his ruin. He was accused of high treason by the duke of Norfolk, attainted in parliament before the divorce, and lost his head on a scaffold, July 28. On August 8, the king's marriage with Catharine Howard was declared void. She was accused of lewdness and adultery upon much better evidence than Anne Boleyn, and was condemned by act of parliament, and beheaded on Tower-hill, February 12, 1542. The lady Rochford, one of her accomplices, who had accused her husband, the lord Rochford, of a criminal commerce with his sister Anne Boleyn, was beheaded with her. Derham, Mannock, and Culpepper, who confessed they had lain with the queen, were also executed. The same year, 1542, Ireland was erected into a kingdom; from which time our kings were styled kings of Ireland, whereas before they had only the title of lords of Ireland. In July 1543, the king took to his sixth wife the lady Catharine Parr, relict of Nevil lord Latimer. She was a great friend to the reformed. King Henry having entered into a league with the emperor against France, passed over to France, and took Bologna, Sept. 14, 1544. This war continued, without much success on either side, till 1546, when a treaty of peace was concluded June 7. King Henry died January 29, 1547, in the 56th year of his age, and 38th of his reign, and was buried at Windsor. He built St. James's palace in the 28th year of his reign; and some time before instituted the college of physicians. Henry VIII. before he became corpulent, was a prince of a goodly personage, and commanding aspect, rather imperious than dignified. He excelled in all the exercises of youth, and possessed a good understanding, which was not much improved by the nature of his education. Instead of learning that philosophy which opens the mind, and extends the qualities of the heart, he was confined to the study of gloomy and scholastic disquisitions, which served to cramp the ideas, and pervert the faculties of reason, qualifying him for the disputant of a cloister, rather than the lawgiver of a people. In the first year of his reign, his pride and vanity seemed to domineer over all his other passions; though from the beginning he was impetuous, headstrong, impatient of contradiction and advice. He was rash, arrogant, prodigal, vain-glorious, pedantic, and superstitious. He delighted in pomp and pageantry, the baubles of a weak mind. His passions, soothed by adulation, rejected all restraint; and as he was an utter stranger to all the finer feelings of the soul, he gratified them at the expence of justice and humanity, without remorse or compunction. He wrested the supremacy from the bishop of Rome, partly on conscientious motives, and partly for reasons of state and convenience. He suppressed the monasteries, in order to supply his extravagance with their spoils; but he would not have made those acquisitions so easily, had they not been productive of advantage to his nobility, and agreeable to the nation in general. He was frequently at war; but the greatest conquest he obtained was over his own parliament and people. Religious disputes had divided them into two factions. He was rapacious, arbitrary, froward, fretful, and so cruel, that he seemed to delight in the blood of his subjects. He never betrayed the least symptoms of any tenderness in his disposition; and seemed to live in defiance of censure, whether ecclesiastical or secular: he died in apprehension of futurity, and was buried at Windsor with idle processions and childish pageantry, which in those days passed for real taste and magnificence.

HE'NSFEET, s. the hedge of fumitory.

HEPATIC, or HEPATICAL, [hepaticus, Lat. from ἥπαρ, Gr.] belonging to, or situated in the liver. Hepatic air, is a permanently elastic fluid, of a very disagreeable odour, somewhat like that of rotten eggs, obtained from combinations of sulphur with earths, alkalies, metals, &c.

HEPS, or HIPS, s. the berries of the dog-rose briar.

HEPTACA'PSULAR, a. [from ἑπτά, Gr. and capsular] having seven cavities or cells.

HEPTAGON, s. [ἑπτά and γωνία, Gr.] a figure with seven sides or angles.

HEPTA'GONAL, a. [from ἑπτά and γωνία, Gr.] having seven angles or sides.

HEPTARCHY, s. [ἑπτά and ἀρχή, Gr.] a government in which seven persons rule independent of each other. The Saxon heptarchy included all England, which was divided into seven petty kingdoms, viz. those of Kent, the South Saxons, West Saxons, East Saxons, Northumberland, East Angles, and Mercia.

HER, pron. belonging to a female; of a she; of a woman; the oblique case of she.

HERA'CLIDÆ, s. [Gr.] descendants, or rather priests and devotees of Hereules. In Chronology, the Return of the HERACLIDÆ into Peloponnesus, forms a celebrated epocha, which constitutes the beginning of profane history; all the time preceding that period being accounted fabulous. It happened in the year of the world 2862; 100 years after they had been expelled, and 80 after the destruction of Troy.

HE'RALD, s. [Teut.] an officer who registers genealogies, adjusts and paints coat armour, and regulates funerals. An officer at arms, whose business it is to declare war, to proclaim peace, to marshal all the solemnity at a coronation, christening, marriage, and funeral of princes, to emblazon and examine coats of arms, &c. Heralds were formerly held in much greater esteem than at present, and were created and christened by the king, who, pouring wine from a gold cup upon their head, gave them the herald-name; but this is now done by the earl-marshal. They could not arrive at the dignity of Herald, without having been seven years pursuivant; nor quit the office of Herald, but to be made king at arms. The three chief Heralds are called Kings at Arms, the principal of which is called Garter; the next is Clarencieux; and the third Norroy; the two last are also called *Provincial Herald*s. Besides these, there are six *inferior Herald*s, viz. York, Lancaster, Somerset, Chester, Richmond, and Windsor; to which, on the coming of king George I. to the crown, a new Herald styled Hanover Herald; and another styled Gloucester King at Arms. The kings at arms, the Heralds, and the four pursuivants, are a college or corporation, by a charter granted by Richard III. and have several privileges, as freedom from subsidies, tolls, &c. Figuratively, a forerunner; omen, or token of something future.

To HE'RALD, v. a. to introduce as by a herald. Not in use.

HERA'LDIC, a. relating to heraldry.

HE'RALDRY, s. [heraulderie, Fr.] the art of armoury and blazoning, which comprehends the knowledge of what relates to solemn cavalcades and ceremonies of coronations, instalments, the creation of peers, nuptials, funerals, &c. Also, whatever relates to the bearing of arms, assigning those that belong to all persons, regulating their right and prece-dencies in point of honour, and restraining those who have not a just claim from bearing coats of arms that do not belong to them. See BLAZONING, ARMS, SHIELD, BEARING, &c.

HERB, s. [herba, Lat. herbe, Fr.] in Botany, a plant whose stalks are soft, and have nothing woody in them; as grass or hemlock. In Cookery, a plant whose leaves are chiefly used; as sage or mint. SYNON. A plant is any vegetable production arising from seed, but seems confined to such as are not very large. Herbs are those plants whose stalks are soft, and have no woody substance.

HERBA'CEOUS, a. [herbaceus, Lat.] belonging to, or having the properties of herbs. Feeding on vegetables.

HERBAGE, s. [herbage, Fr.] a collective or general term applied to several sorts of herbs; grass, or pasture. In Law, the tithe or right of pasture.

HERBWOMAN, s. a woman who sells herbs.

HERBY, a. partaking of the nature of herbs.

HERCULA'NEUM, an ancient city of Italy, near Naples, totally destroyed by an eruption of mount Vesuvius, in the reign of the emperor Titus. In the years 1639 and 1711, upon digging in these parts, something of this city was discovered. In 1738 fresh attempts were made, and since that time a prodigious number of monuments of every kind have been discovered, such as paintings, statues, bustoes, furniture, utensils, &c. The situation was near where Portici now stands.

HERCULE'AN, a. a term applied to that which requires much strength, labour, and difficulty to perform; of extraordinary strength, like Hercules; large; massy.

HERCULES, a fabulous hero, the reputed son of Jupiter by Alcmena, born at Thebes, in Bœotia. By the envy of Juno he narrowly escaped death; for she sent two serpents to destroy him in his cradle, but he overcame and killed them. The wrath of the goddess pursued him through life; and she made him subject to Eurystheus, king of Messenia, usurper of the throne he ought to have enjoyed. This tyrant assigned him various dangerous undertakings, in the hope that he would perish in the execution; but he came off victorious, and they are commonly called the "twelve labours of Hercules." They were as follows: 1. He overcame the lion of Nemæa, whose skin he wore continually afterwards; for which reason, painters, sculptors, &c. commonly represent him so dressed. 2. He destroyed the hydra, or monster with seven heads. 3. He conquered the Erymanthean boar. 4. He caught a hind with golden horns and brazen hoofs, in the forest of Parthenia, after a year's hunting. 5. He destroyed the harpies. 6. He subdued the Amazons, took their queen's girdle, and obliged her to marry his friend Theseus. 7. He cleansed Augea's stable. 8. He overcame the Cretan bull, Pasiphaë's gallant, who vomited fire. 9. He killed Diomedes, and his horses, which he had fed with men's flesh. 10. He subdued the Spanish Geryon, and carried away his flock. 11. He took away the golden apples from the garden of Hesperides, and killed the dragon that watched them. 12. He brought Cerberus, the three-headed dog, from hell. In addition to these exploits he conquered the Centaurs, crushed Antheus to death between his arms, bore the heavens on his shoulders, to relieve Atlas, &c. After death, he was taken into the number of the gods, and married Hebe, the goddess of Youth. The ancients moralize this fable thus: By Hercules (they say) the strength of reason and philosophy is meant, which subdues and conquers our irregular passions; and his marriage intimates that great and noble actions are always fresh blooming in the memory of all, being transmitted in the histories of their times to the latest posterity.

HE'RCULES-PILLARS, anciently so called, are thought to be the two mountains which form the straits of Gibraltar; namely, Calpe on the side of Europe, and Avila on that of Africa.

HERD, s. [heord, Sax.] a number or multitude of beasts, generally applied to black cattle; flocks being applied to sheep. A company of men, in contempt or detestation. A keeper of cattle, or herdsman, from hyrd, Sax. hence goat-herd and sheep-herd, by contraction shepherd.

HI'ERES, a cluster of small islands in the Mediterranean Sea, on the coast of France, opposite the town of Hieres, in the department of Var. Three of them, namely, Porquerolles, Porteros, or Port Cross, and Bagueau, are inhabited; and the isle of Titan, or Levant, the largest of them, is capable of cultivation. They abound in medicinal plants. Between these islands and the continent is the Road or Gulf of Hieres, affording an excellent and capacious shelter for large squadrons.

HI'ERES, a town of France, in the department of Var, seated on the skirts of a mountain, in a pleasant and fruitful country, in which are found the best fruits of France. During great part of the winter, the verdure of the country is as fine as in the spring, and, in many gardens, green pease may be gathered. Near the town are large salt-works; and a canal is cut from the salt lakes to the sea. It is 12 miles E. of Toulon, and 350 S. by E. of Paris. Lat. 43. 5. N. lon. 6. 20. E.

HIEROGLYPH, or HIEROGLYPHIC, s. [from ἱερός, sacred, and γλύφω, Gr. to engrave or carve, because originally carved on walls or obelisks] an emblem or picturesque representation of something. This, being the first method of writing, was generally understood by every one: but when characters were introduced instead of pictures, the meaning of hieroglyphics became at length unintelligible. Being made use of by the Egyptian priests to keep the mysteries of their religion from the knowledge of the vulgar, they were called hieroglyphics, or sacred characters.

HIEROGLYPHIC, or HIEROGLYPHICAL, a. [hieroglyphique, Fr.] emblematical; expressive of some meaning beyond what immediately appears.

HIEROGLYPHICALLY, ad. emblematically.

HI'GH-FLYING, part. extravagant in claims or opinions.

HI'GHGATE, a large populous hamlet, in the parishes of Hornsey and Pancras, 4 miles N. by W. of London. It has its name from its high situation on the top of a hill, and a gate erected there about 400 years ago, to receive toll for the bishop of London. An ancient practice long prevailed here, and is still occasionally resorted to, of swearing travellers and visitors on the horns. A pair of large horns, fixed to the end of a staff, is brought out for the party to hold, while a kind of burlesque oath is administered, that he will never eat brown bread when he can get white, and other things of the same kind, which is altered according to the sexes, with an allowance of adding to each article the words, "Except I like the other better." The whole being over, the juror kisses the horns, and pays a shilling for the oath. Highgate has a free-school, built by lord chief baron Cholmondeley, in 1562, which was enlarged in 1570 by Sandys, bishop of London, who also built the chapel, commonly called Highgate church.

HI'GHLAND, s. a place abounding in mountains.

HI'GHLANDERS, a people in the N. of Scotland, who inhabit the mountainous parts, and have long been remarkable for their particular dress, which some suppose to be like that of the ancient Romans. They are generally strong, able-bodied men, and make excellent soldiers. They were divided into several clans, each of which had a chief or head, and whom they generally followed in case of war, or even in a rebellion; but now this subordination is taken away by act of parliament, and attempts are making to introduce manufactures and trade among them.

HOLLAND, or Dutch Netherlands, a country of Europe, extending 150 miles from N. to S. and 100 from E. to W.; bounded on the N. and W. by the German Ocean, on the E. by Westphalia, and on the S. by Belgium. It comprises the seven provinces of Groningen, Friesland, Overijssel, Gelderland, Utrecht, Zealand, and Holland Proper, with Dutch Brabant, which was styled the Land of the Generality. These long constituted a powerful republic, under the title of the Seven United Provinces. This country was a part of that inhabited by the ancient Batavi, and is still frequently denominated Batavia; but more usually Holland, from the chief province, which signifies a low, hollow country. The principal rivers are the Yssel, the Rhine, the Vecht, the Waal, the Meuse or Maes; the Dommel, and the Scheldt. The air and water are bad, and the soil naturally produces little else than turf; yet the Dutch, by incessant industry, have rendered their country one of the richest spots of Europe for population and property. Among the most valuable productions of the country, may be reckoned its excellent cattle; and large quantities of madder are exported, chiefly cultivated in Zealand. The principal revenue arises from the herring, cod, and whale fisheries. The Dutch trade, though not so extensive as formerly, is still considerable, and renders the country a kind of universal warehouse for the commodities of every quarter of the globe. The Dutch have colonies and settlements in Asia, particularly in the Spice Islands, also in Guinea, and in the West Indies, and South America. The domestic commerce is carried on by means of numerous canals, which answer the purpose of high roads in other countries: and the country contains thousands of wind-mills for sawing timber, grinding corn, &c. The manufactures also are various and extensive. From 1579 to 1795, the United Provinces formed a political confederacy for their mutual defence; though, with respect to internal government, each province was independent of the rest. They all sent deputies to a general assembly, called the States-General, which was invested with the supreme legislative power of the Union; and, with some interruptions, there was an officer called the stadtholder at the head of the government, who exercised a considerable part of the executive power. This important post was held by the Princes of Orange, at first by election; but hereditarily from 1672. In 1795, when the French republicans, taking advantage of a severe frost, overrun the country, William V. fled with his family to England, where he died; and the United Provinces received a new form of government from their invaders, under the title of the Batavian Republic. In 1806, the emperor Napoleon raised them to the rank of a kingdom, in favour of his brother Louis; but in 1810, he made Louis descend from his throne, and he united Holland to the French empire. In November 1813, when Napoleon had lost the flower of his army in Russia, the Dutch suddenly effected a revolution, and recalled the prince of Orange, son of the late stadtholder, who made his solemn entry into Amsterdam, on the 1st of December, and was proclaimed sovereign prince of the Netherlands. In this new title was included the sovereignty not only of the Seven United Provinces, but of the whole of Belgium; and in 1815, prince William exchanged it for that of king of the Netherlands.

HOLLAND, the most considerable province of the Dutch Netherlands, lying between the Zuyder-Zee, the North Sea, Zealand, and Utrecht. It is divided into N. Holland, or W. Friesland, and S. Holland; and these together make but one province, of which the states take the title of Holland and W. Friesland. The Ye, or Wye, a small bay, which is an extension of the Zuyder-Zee, separates S. Holland from W. Friesland. This province is not above 180 miles in circumference, but more populous than any other country of equal extent in Europe. The land is almost every where lower than the sea; and the water is kept out by dams and dykes. It is crossed by the Rhine and Maes, by several smaller rivers, and by a great number of canals, which are used for travelling upon, day and night, at a small expense. The pastures are rich, so that the inhabitants have plenty of butter and cheese; while the seas and rivers furnish them with fish. There are 400 large towns, and 18 cities, which make up the states of the province, besides several others that have not the same privilege. The houses are well built, and extremely neat and clean, as well in the country as in the towns. Learning has flourished here; and it has both linen and woollen manufactures, besides numerous docks for ship-building. The Dutch formerly surpassed all other nations with regard to trade, and by their settlements in foreign countries, especially in the East Indies, and on the coast of Guinea. This province had a court of justice, which finally determines in all criminal and civil affairs; and its states in which the sovereignty resided, were composed of the deputies of the nobility and of the cities, besides the stadtholder. Amsterdam is the capital city.

HOLLAND, a district of Lincolnshire, in the S. E. part of the county, divided into Upper and Lower, and reaching from Wainsfleet to the Isle of Ely, and to the grounds opposite Lynn in Norfolk. In nature, as well as appellation, it resembles the province of the same name in the Netherlands, and consists entirely of fens and marshes, in which are many quicksands, some in a state of nature, others cut by numberless drains and canals, and crossed by raised causeways. The lower or southern division is the most watery, and is preserved from constant inundation by vast banks, raised on the sea-coast and rivers. It was formerly impassable; but since the fens have been drained, the lands have grown more solid, and the inhabitants sow cole-seed upon them to their great advantage. The air is reckoned unwholesome, and the water, in general, is so brackish as to be unfit for internal purposes: on which account, the inhabitants are obliged to make reservoirs of rain water. In summer, vast swarms of insects fill the air, and prove exceedingly offensive. Prodigious flocks of geese are bred among the undrained fens, forming a considerable object of commerce, as well for their quills and feathers, as for the bird itself, which is driven in great numbers to the London markets. The principal decoys in England, for the various kinds of wild ducks, teal, widgeon, and other fowls of the duck kind, are in these parts. Wild geese, grebes, godwits, whimbrels, coots, ruffs, reeves, bitterns, and a great variety of other species of water-fowl, breed here in amazing numbers; and stares, or starlings, resort hither during the winter in myriads, to roost on the reeds, breaking them down by their weight. Near Spalding is the greatest heronry in England, where the herons build together on high trees, like rooks. The avoset, or yelder, is found in great numbers about Fosdyke Wash, as are also knots and dottrels.

HOLLAND, NEW, in strict propriety the name of the western half of Terra Australis, which geographers divide by the meridional line of 135° E. into New Holland on the West; and New South Wales on the East. It is, however, frequently used for the whole of that vast island; in which sense it may be said to extend from 109. to 153. E. lon. and from 11. to 39. S. lat. independently of Van Diemen's Land, which was long considered as its southern extremity. It is believed that the N. W. parts of this country had been frequently visited by Europeans, nearly a century before any authentic accounts speak of its discovery, and it obtained the name of Terra Australis. When the Dutch first explored this country, they called the W. coast New Holland; but some time after Tasman's second voyage, in 1644, the whole of the territory then known was comprehended under that title. The eastern part of this vast tract remained unknown, till Captain Cook explored it, in 1770, and gave it the name of New South Wales. Captain Furneaut, by connecting Tasman's discoveries with those of Cook, completed the circuit; and as neither appellation was deemed proper for the whole, the original name, Terra Australis, was restored, the two sides retaining their respective titles of New Holland and New South Wales, and the meridian of 135. E. lon. forming an imaginary boundary between them. In 1798, surgeon Bass discovered the strait which separates Van Diemen's Land from the southern part of the main; and in 1802, Captain Flinders circumnavigated the whole, and ascertained that no other intersection exists. In consequence of the recommendation of Captain Cook, a design was formed of settling a colony of convicts at Botany Bay, on the E. coast of this country; but it did not obtain the sanction of parliament till 1787; soon after which a squadron sailed from England with 778 convicts, of whom 558 were males, in six transports, under the escort of the Sirius frigate, Captain Hunter, and the Supply armed tender, Lieutenant Ball, with three store-ships for provisions and stores for two years. On the 18th January, 1788, they arrived in Botany Bay; but Captain Philip, who went out as governor of the intended colony, deeming the place inelegible, fixed on Port Jackson, 13 miles more to the N. for the place of his settlement, to which he gave the name of Sydney Cove. The colony has prospered, and branches have been established about it. In 1810, the number of inhabitants at Sydney was 6158; at Paramatta, 1807; at Hawkesbury, 2389; and at Newcastle, 100. Total 10,454; of which 5513 were men, 2220 women, and 2721 children. In Van Dieman's Land, there were 1321; and in Norfolk Island, 177. In November, 1818, a general return was made of 25,050 souls in New South Wales and its dependencies. Upwards of 100,000 acres had been brought into cultivation; the horses were 3675; horned cattle, 55,450; sheep, 201,240; and hogs, 24,822. Various manufactures have been established; so that the settlement is now nearly independent of the mother country for the necessaries, or even the elegancies, of life. Iron and coal, both of a very fine quality, are in abundance; and valuable stones have been discovered, among which are white and yellow topazes, of greater worth than those of Brazil. The general face of the country is diversified with gentle risings and small winding valleys, generally covered with large spreading trees, which afford a succession of trees; and in places free from trees are a variety of flowering shrubs. The heat is never excessive in summer, nor the cold intolerable in winter; thunder storms are frequent, but the atmosphere is generally bright and clear. The quadrupeds are chiefly of the opossum kind, of which the most remarkable is the kangaroo. There are many beautiful birds of various kinds, and numerous tribes of reptiles and insects; besides many curious fishes. The natives are represented as savage in the extreme; going entirely naked, with their bodies smeared with dirt and filth. Their colour is rather a deep chocolate than black. The settlement in New South Wales is bounded on the N. W. and S. by a ridge of hills, called the Blue Mountains, which governor Macquarie, with a large retinue, passed in 1814, and fixed on a site for a town, to be called Bathurst, on the left bank of a river, which was named Macquarie, in lon. 149. 38. E. lat. 33. 24. S. From this place, an exploring party went 155 miles to the S. through fine valleys, separated by hills covered with useful trees, and abounding in rivers, pools, and streams.

HO'LLAND, s. in Commerce, a fine and close kind of linen, so called from its being first manufactured in Holland.

HO'LLOW, a. [from hole] having the inside or any part scooped out; having a void space within, opposed to solid. Light; loose. Noisy, or like a sound made in some cavity. Figuratively, hypocritical; insidious; treacherous.

HO'LLOW, s. a cavity or empty space; a concavity; a cavern or den; a pit, passage, or internal void.

To HO'LLOW, v. a. to scoop furrows, channels, or cavities in a thing. To shout or make a loud noise. "Comes hollowing from the stable." Pope. So written by neglect of etymology, instead of holla, says Johnson.

HO'LLOWLY, ad. with empty spaces within; with channels or vacuities. Figuratively, with insincerity.

HO'LLOWNESS, s. cavity; the state of having empty spaces; want of sincerity; deceit; treachery.

HO'LLY, s. a tree of which there are a great many varieties, with prickly leaves, small white blossoms, and red or yellow berries.

HO'LLYHOCK, s. [holihoc, Sax.] the rose-mallow.

HOLM, s. [Sax.] a river island; an islet; low land near a river. Also, a hill or mountain. In Botany, the ilex, or ever-green oak, from the Saxon holen.

HO'LOCAUST, s. [from ῥλος and καίω, Gr.] a burnt sacrifice; a sacrifice, of which the whole was consumed by fire, and nothing retained by the offerer.

HO'LOGRAPH, s. [ῥλος and γράφω, Gr.] in the Scottish law, a deed written entirely by the granter's hand.

HO'LPEN, the old part. pass. of HELP.

HOLSTEIN, a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, subject to the king of Denmark, having Sleswick on the N. the Baltic, and the duchy of Saxe-Lunenburg on the E. the duchies of Bremen and Lunenburg on the S. and the German Ocean on the W. It is about 100 miles in length, and 50 in breadth, and is a pleasant fruitful country. It is also well seated for trade, and has some considerable harbours, particularly those of Hamburg and Lubeck. From Keil is a canal to the Eider, at Rensberg, by which there is a free navigation from the Baltic to the German Ocean.

HO'LSTER, s. [hulster, Teut.] a case for a horseman's pistol.

HOLT, a town in Norfolk, with a market on Saturday, and an excellent free-school, founded by Sir J. Gresham. It has a church, about 300 good houses, with pretty wide streets well paved, and about 1000 people; but neither corporation nor manufacture. It is 21 miles W. N. of Norwich, and 119 N. E. of London.

HOLT, at the beginning or end of the name of a place, from holt, Sax. a wood, signifies that is, or has been, woody; sometimes indeed it may come from hol, Sax. hollow, especially when the name ends in tun or dun. A wood, grove, or forest. A hill.

HO'LY, a. [halig, Sax.] pious, religious, good; consecrated, or dedicated to divine uses; pure, or without spot; sacred.

HO'LY GHOST, s. [halig and gast, Sax.] the Holy Spirit, or Third Person in the adorable Trinity, whose peculiar office, as distinguished from the Father and the Son, is sanctification and inspiration.

HO'LY-THURSDAY, s. the day on which the ascension of our Saviour is commemorated, ten days before Whitsunday.

HO'LY-WEEK, s. [halgan and wuca, Sax.] the week before Easter, so called because set apart by the church in a peculiar manner to offices of piety and devotion, as a preparation for the ensuing festival of Christ's resurrection.

HO'LYDAY, or HO'LIDAY, s. [halgan and dæg, Sax.] a day set apart by the church for commemoration of some saint, or some remarkable particular in the life of Christ; a day wherein people abstain from work, and entertain themselves with feasts, &c. a day of gaiety and joy.

HO'LYHEAD, a sea-port, and cape of the Isle of Anglesea, but separated from it by a narrow channel, whence it is called Holyhead Island. It is joined to Anglesea by a stone bridge of one arch; and being the station of the packet boats to and from Dublin, it has become considerable. It has several remains of old fortifications, and there are some Druidical antiquities in its neighbourhood. Under the mountains that overhang the town, is a large cavern in the rock, supported by natural pillars, and called the parliament-house; it is accessible only by boats, and the tide runs into it. On the adjacent rocks, grows the herb of which kelp is made, for the glass and alum manufactures; and in the neighbourhood is a large vein of white fuller's earth, and another of yellow. On the Isle of Skerries, 9 miles to the N. is a light-house. Large flocks of puffins are often seen here; they all come in one night, and depart in the same manner. The commodities are butter, cheese, bacon, wild fowl, lobsters, crabs, oysters, razor-fish, shrimps, herrings, cod-fish, whittings, sea tenches, and plenty of other fish. It is, in fact, little more than a fishing town, with a small market on Saturday, three good inns, and a very convenient harbour, lately very much improved, for the northern trade, when taken short by contrary winds. The Dublin packet used to sail hence every Tuesday; but since the establishment of steam-boats, there is a conveyance over every day. His present Majesty, on his first visit to Ireland, crossed over in one of these conveyances, called the Lightning, on Sunday, the 12th August, 1821, and in commemoration of the event, his Majesty ordered the packet to be named the "Royal George the Fourth." It is 60 miles east of Dublin, 24 nearly W. of Beaumaris, and 262 N. W. of London. Lat. 53. 23. N. lon. 4. 40. W.

HOLY-ISLAND, or Lindisfarne, a small island on the coast of Northumberland, about 8 miles S. E. of Berwick, and one mile and a half from the nearest land, from whence, at low water, people ride over to it. It is three miles long, and two in breadth, and consists of one continued plain. The soil is rocky and full of stones, for which reason it is thinly peopled: it has but one small town, or rather village, called Kylo, standing on a rising ground; and consisting of a few scattered houses, chiefly inhabited by fishermen, with two inns, and a church. Under the castle, which stands at the southern point, on an almost perpendicular rock, near 60 feet high, is a commodious bay, or harbour, defended by a block-house. The castle is accessible only by a narrow and winding pass, cut out of the rock, on its southern side. The N. and N. E. coasts of the island are formed of perpendicular rocks; the other sides sink, by gradual slopes, to the sand. It has plenty of fish and fowl, but the air and soil are reckoned bad. The W. part is left wholly to the rabbits, and there is not a tree on the island. The ancient monastery, which covered near four acres, and of which St. Cuthbert was prior, is entirely in ruins, but there are various fragments of the offices remaining. It is properly a semi-island, being encompassed with water at every flood, but sand at ebb. The E. part, which is much the broadest, is joined to the W. by a small slip of land.

HOLYWELL, a town of Wales, in Flintshire, which, from its vicinity to the lead mines, and its considerable manufactures, has become the most flourishing in the county. It takes its name from the famous well of St. Winifred, concerning which many fables and superstitious notions have prevailed. It is a copious stream of very cold and pure water, bursting out of the ground at the foot of a hill, with such impetuosity as to discharge 21 tons of water in a minute. Over the spring there is a chapel, built by the countess of Derby, mother of Henry VII. which stands upon pillars, and on the windows are painted the history of St. Winifred's life. Besides the cold bath, celebrated for wonderful cures, formed at the spring head, and covered with a beautiful Gothic shrine, it is now applied to the purpose of turning several mills for the working of copper, making brass-wire, paper, and snuff, and spinning cotton. It is 10 miles E. by N. of St. Asaph, and 208 (by Chester) N. W. of London. Market on Friday. Inhabitants, about 7000.

HOMOLOGOUS, a. [ὁμόλογος, Gr.] having the same proportions or manners. In Logic, applied to things which agree in name, but have a different nature.

HOMONYMOUS, a. [ὁμώνυμος, Gr.] signifying several things, applied to words which have several senses.

HOMONYMY, s. [ὁμωνυμία, Gr.] equivocation; ambiguity.

HOMOTONOUS, a. [ὁμότονος, Gr.] having the same sound.

HOMOTONY, s. [from ὁμότονος, Gr.] sameness of sound.

HONDURAS, a large province of N. America, bounded on the N. by the bay of the same name, on the E. by the Mosquitos shore, on the S. by Nicaragua and Guatemala, and on the W. by Guatemala and Vera Paz. This country, though exceedingly fertile by nature, is almost a desert. The soil, in many parts, bears Indian corn and grapes three times a year; its other produce is wheat, pease, large gourds, cotton, wool, honey, wax, and provisions of all kinds. It produces, in greater abundance than any part of America, the log-wood tree, which in dyeing some colours is so far preferable to any other material, that the consumption of it in Europe is considerable, and it is become an article in commerce of great value. During a long period no European nation intruded upon the Spaniards in these provinces, or attempted to obtain any share in this branch of trade. But after the conquest of Jamaica by the English, one of the first objects of the settlers on that island, was the great profit arising from the log-wood trade, and the facility of wresting some portion of it from the Spaniards. Their first attempt was made at Cape Catoche, the N. E. promontory of Yucatan. When most of the trees near this Cape were felled, they removed to the island of Trist, in the Bay of Campeachy; and in later times, their principal station has been in the Bay of Honduras. The Spaniards, alarmed at this encroachment, endeavoured by negotiation, remonstrances, and open force, to prevent the English from obtaining any footing on that part of the American continent. But, after struggling against it for more than a century, the disasters of an unsuccessful war extorted from the court of Madrid, in 1763, a reluctant consent to tolerate this settlement of foreigners in the heart of its territories. This privilege was confirmed by the definitive treaty of 1783; by which, however, it was stipulated, that nothing in this concession should be considered as derogating, in any respect, from "the sovereignty of his Catholic Majesty;" that, if the English had erected any fortifications in the country, they should be demolished, and none erected in future; and that they should confine themselves within a certain district, lying between the rivers Wallis, or Bellize, and Rio Honda, taking the course of the said two rivers for unalterable boundaries, so as that the navigation of them be common to both nations. But by a convention signed in 1786, these limits were extended; the English line beginning from the sea, was to take the centre of the river Sibun or Jabon, and continue up to the source of the said river; thence to cross, in a straight line, the intermediate land, till it intersected the river Wallis; and by the centre of the same river, the said line was to descend to the point where it would meet the line already settled in 1783. By this convention, moreover, the English were not only permitted to cut logwood, but mahogany, or any other kind of wood, and to carry away any other produce of the country; with certain exceptions, however, against the establishing of any plantations of sugar, coffee, &c. and they were likewise permitted, with certain restrictions, to occupy the small island called Casina, St. George's Key, or Cayo Casina. The English settlement in this country had formerly been considered as foreign: but in 1790, by an act of parliament, they were allowed all the privileges of a British colony. The principal towns are Valladolid, the capital; Truxillo; Gracias a Dios; and St. Jago.

HONE, s. a fine sort of whetstone, of different colours, used for setting an edge on penknives and razors.

HO'NEY-FLOWER, s. a plant with a perennial root, and of the appearance of a shrub. It produces large spikes of chocolate-coloured flowers in May, in each of which is contained a large quantity of black sweet liquor, from whence it is supposed to derive its name.

HO'NEY-MOON, s. the first month after marriage, so called from the fondness and tenderness which appears then between a married couple.

HO'NEYSUCKLE, s. [hunig-sucle, Sax.] in Botany, a plant so called from the sweetness of its odour; it is likewise named the woodbine.

HO'NEYLESS, a. without honey, or robbed of their honey, applied to bees.

HO'NIED, a. covered with honey. Sweet, flattering, or enticing, applied to words.

HO'NITON, a neat, well-built, and populous town of Devonshire, with a large manufactory of broad lace, (formerly of serges) and an estimated exportation to London of about five tons of butter weekly. It is pleasantly seated on the river Otter, over which it has a bridge, in the best and pleasantest part of the county, abounding with uncommonly beautiful landscapes all the way to Exeter, and on the great western road from London, 16 miles E. of Exeter, and 156 W. by S. of London. Market on Saturday.

HO'NORARY, a. [honorarius, Lat.] done in order to confer honour, or as a mark of esteem; conferring honour, but not gain.

HO'NOUR, (the u in this word and all its derivatives and compounds, is dropped in pronunciation; as hônör, hônörable, &c.) s. honor, Lat.] dignity or high rank. Reputation; fame. Reverence. Chastity. Dignity of mien. Glory; boast. A testimony or token of respect and esteem, used after do. The title of a person of rank. A subject of praise. Glory. A regard to the respect and esteem of the world. Nobleness or majesty, applied to persons. A place, office, or title, which attracts esteem. Ornament and respect. "The honours of his head." Dryden.

To HO'NOUR, v. a. [honoro, Lat.] to esteem or respect; to entertain an inward esteem and reverence for any person superior to us in any relation, and to shew it by outward signs and actions.

HO'NOURABLE, a. [honorabile, Fr.] worthy of respect or reverence; great, suitable to a person's dignity; generous; conferring or attracting respect and reverence; without taint or reproach; honest; equitable.

To HOOT, v. n. [hwt, Brit.] to make a noise in contempt; to cry like an owl. Actively, to drive with a noise and shouts.

HOOT, s. [huée, Fr.] a clamour, shout, or noise made at a person in contempt; the noise made by an owl.

To HOP, v. n. [hoppa, Sax.] to jump or skip lightly; to move by leaps on one leg. Figuratively, to hop or walk lamely, by laying all our stress on one leg; to move; to play.

HOP, s. a leap made with one leg; a light or small jump, generally applied to the motion of birds on the ground, or the manner in which they move from one branch of a tree to another, without extending their legs. In Botany, a plant whose flower is used as a bitter in brewing, to keep beer from turning sour, from hop, Belg.

To HOP, v. a. to impregnate with hops; to make bitter with hops.

HOPE, s. [opa, Sax. hope, Belg.] that pleasure which arises in the mind on the thought of the enjoyment of some future good; an expectation of some future good. SYNON. Hope, has for its object, success in itself, and denotes a trust borne up by some encouragement. Expect regards particularly the happy moment of event, and intimates a certainty of its arriving. Thus, we hope to obtain things; we expect their arriving. What we hope for seems to be more a favour or a kindness; what we expect, more a duty or obligation. Thus, we hope for favourable answers to our demands; we expect such as are agreeable to our propositions.

To HOPE, v. n. to expect a future good.

HOPEFUL, a. full of qualities which produce hope; promising; full of hope or expectation of success. The last sense, though strictly analogical, is seldom used.

HOPEFULLY, ad. in such a manner as to raise hope, or encourage an expectation of some future good.

HOTTENTOTS, Country of The, a large region in the southern extremity of Africa, which extends N. by W.

along the coast, from the Cape of Good Hope, beyond the mouth of the Orange River, and from that Cape, in an E. N. E. direction, to the mouth of the Great Fish River, which parts it from Caffraria Proper. There are no considerable kingdoms throughout this large extent of country, the whole being inhabited by different tribes, or nations, governed by honquers, or chiefs, who live, like the Arabs, in huts, or portable houses, and remove their kraals, or villages, whenever the pasture becomes too bare for the subsistence of their cattle, and upon the natural and violent death of an inhabitant. The Hottentots of the Cape consist of a few paltry and miserable hordes, who have not even the power of choosing their own chief, and live, as they can, in different cantons of the colony; but the savage Hottentots, called, by way of derision, the Jackal Hottentots, far removed from the government of the Europeans, still preserve their original manners. The Hottentots, in general, are as tall as most Europeans, but more slender, and their hands and feet are small. Their skin is of a yellowish brown hue, somewhat resembling that of an European who has the jaundice in a high degree; but this colour is not at all observable in the whites of the eyes. There are not such thick lips among the Hottentots as among their neighbours the Negroes, the Caffres, and the Mozambiques. Their mouth is of the middling size; and they have, in general, the finest set of teeth imaginable. Their heads are covered with hair more woolly, if possible, than that of the Negroes. With respect to their shape, carriage, and every motion, their whole appearance indicates health and content. There is a volatility in their manner which shews an abundant flow of spirits, or a high enjoyment of animal life; in their intercourse with Europeans they hardly stand still for a moment. In their mien, moreover, a degree of carelessness is observable, that discovers marks of alacrity and resolution; qualities which, upon occasion, they certainly can exhibit, as in their encounters with lions and other wild beasts. Not only the men, but the women also, are clothed with sheep-skins; the wool being worn outwards in summer, and inwards during the winter. They wear one skin over their shoulders, the ends of it crossing each other before, and leaving their neck bare. Another skin is fastened round their middle, and reaches down to their knees. They besmear their bodies all over, very copiously, with fat, in which there is mixed up a little soot, and this is never wiped off. They likewise perfume themselves with powder of herbs, with which they powder both the head and body, rubbing it all over them, when they besmear themselves. The odour of this powder is rank and aromatic, and comes nearest to that of the poppy mixed with spices. Some of them adorn themselves with necklaces of shells. The women cover themselves much more scrupulously than the men. They seldom content themselves with one covering, but almost always have two, and very often three. These are made of a prepared and well greased skin, and are fastened about their bodies with a thong, almost like the aprons of European women. The outermost is always the largest, measuring from about six inches to a foot over. This is likewise, generally, the finest and most showy, and is frequently adorned with glass beads, strung in different figures. Both the men and women generally go bare-headed. Neither their ears nor nose are adorned with any pendent ornaments, as they are among other savages. The nose, however, is sometimes, by way of greater state, marked with a black streak of soot, or with a large spot of red lead; of which latter, on their high days and holidays, they likewise put a little on their cheeks. Both sexes wear rings on their arms and legs; most of these are made of thick leather straps, cut in a circular shape; and these have given rise to the almost universally received notion, that the Hottentots wrap guts about their legs, in order to eat them occasionally. Rings of iron, copper, or brass, of the size of a goose quill, are considered as more genteel than those of leather; but the girls are not allowed to use any rings till they are marriageable. The Hottentots seldom wear any shoes; what they do wear are made of undressed leather, with the hairy side outward; they are rendered soft and pliable, by being beat and moistened, and are very light and cool. Their habitations are some of them of a circular, and some of an oblong shape, resembling a round bee-hive, or a vault; the ground plot is from 18 to 24 feet in diameter. The highest of them are so low, that it is scarcely possible for a middle-sized man to stand upright. But neither the lowness of the hut, nor that of the door, which is barely three feet high, can be considered as any inconvenience to a Hottentot, who finds no difficulty in stooping, and crawling on all fours. The fire-place is in the middle, and they sit or lie round it in a circle. The low door is the only place that admits the light, and, at the same time, the only outlet that is left for the smoke. The Hottentot, inured to it from his infancy, sees it hover round him, without feeling the least inconvenience arising from it to his eyes; while rolled up like a hedge-hog, and wrapped up snug in his skin, he lies at the bottom of his hut, quite at his ease, in the midst of this cloud, except that he is now and then obliged to peep out from beneath his sheep-skin, in order to stir the fire, or perhaps to light his pipe, or else, sometimes to turn the steak he is broiling over the coals. The order of these huts, in a kraal, or clan, is most frequently in the form of a circle, with the doors inward; by which means a kind of yard is formed, where the cattle are kept at night. The milk, as soon as it is taken from the cow, is put to other milk, which is curdled, and is kept in a leather sack, the hairy side of which, being considered as the cleanest, is turned inward; so that the milk is never drank while it is sweet. Among other tribes of Hottentots are the Boshiesmen, or Boshmans, who inhabit the mountains in the interior part of the country N. E. of the Cape of Good Hope, and are averse to the pastoral life. Some of their maxims are, to live on hunting and plunder, and never to keep any animal alive for the space of one night. On this account they themselves are pursued, and sometimes exterminated, like wild beasts, or taken and made slaves of. Bushes and clefts in rocks serve them by turns for dwellings. Many of them are entirely naked; but some of them cover their body with the skin of any sort of animal, great or small, from the shoulder downward as far as it will reach, wearing it till it falls off their backs in rags. Ignorant of agriculture, they are obliged to wander over hills and dales, after certain wild roots, berries, and plants, which they eat raw. Their table, however, is composed of several other dishes, among which are the larvæ of insects, the caterpillars from which butterflies are produced, the termites, or white ants, grasshoppers, snails, and spiders. With all these changes of diet, the Boshman is, nevertheless, frequently in want. When captured as a slave, he exchanges his meagre fare for the luxury of buttermilk, frumenty, or hasty-pudding, and sometimes becomes fat in a few weeks. This good living, however, is soon embittered by the grumbling of his master and mistress; and he must frequently bear, perhaps, a few curses or blows, for neglect and indolence. Disliking labour, and from his corpulency become less capable of bearing it, he now pines after his former uncontrolled and wandering life, which he generally endeavours to regain by escaping. Another tribe of Hottentots, near the mouth of Orange River, have huts superior to those of the generality of Hottentots;

they are loftier, and thatched with grass; and are furnished with stools made of the back-bones of the grampus. Their mode of living is in the highest degree wretched, and they are apparently the most dirty of all the Hottentot tribes. Their dress is composed of the skins of seals and jackals, the flesh of which they eat. When a grampus is cast ashore, they remove their huts to the place, and subsist upon it as long as any part of it remains; and in this manner it sometimes affords them subsistence for half a year. They smear their skin with the oil, the odour of which is so powerful, that their approach may be perceived some time before they present themselves in view. They carry their water in the shells of ostrich eggs, and the bladders of seals, which they shoot with arrows, the same as the other Hottentots. Though one small hut contains the whole family, and all are obliged to repose together, they are chaste in their manners. Severe in their jurisprudence, they punish murder, adultery, and robbery, with death.—By the exertions of Protestant missionaries from Europe, much has been done for the Hottentots and Boshmen; and civilization and religion have made astonishing progress among them.—The country possessed by the Dutch is of considerable extent, comprehending the large tract between Table Bay and False Bay, and that which is called Hottentot Holland, extending from False Bay to the Cabo dos Agulhas, or Cape of Needles, and the country farther E. beyond St. Christopher's river, called Terra de Natal. The coast of this country abounds in bays and capes; it is naturally mountainous and barren, but the industrious Dutch have overcome all natural difficulties, and it not only produces a sufficiency of all the necessities of life for the inhabitants, but also of refreshments for all the European ships that touch here. In the interior parts, however, the soil is astonishingly fertile and productive. The Dutch consider the year as divided into two seasons, which they term monsoons: the wet monsoon, or winter; and the dry one, or summer. The first begins with our spring; the latter when our summer ends. In the damp season, the Cape is much subject to fogs; and from the middle of the wet monsoon, it rains almost continually till summer; the weather is cold, raw, and unpleasant; but never more rigorous than autumn in Germany. Water never freezes to above the thickness of half a crown; and, as soon as the sun appears, the ice is dissolved. The Cape is rarely visited by thunder and lightning, excepting a little near the turn of the seasons. Among the quadrupeds of this country are antelopes, which go in herds of 20 or 30,000 each; buffaloes; giraffes, or camelopardalises; the gemsbock, or chamois, a species of antelope, which has remarkably long sharp horns; wild dogs, much larger than the jackal, which travel in herds, and are very destructive to flocks of sheep; elephants; elks; hyenas; the koedo, an animal of a mouse colour, rather larger than our deer, with three white stripes over the back, and the male having very large twisted horns; lions; jackals; tigers; panthers; the quacha, a species of the zebra, but more tractable; the double-horned rhinoceros; horses; domestic horned cattle; common sheep; and a peculiar species of sheep, which are covered with hair instead of wool. The hippopotamus, or river-horse, is frequently seen here. Among the birds are vultures; ostriches, whose eggs are excellent food; and the loxia, a species of gregarious bird, which builds its curious nest in the mimosa tree, where it forms a kind of thatched house, with a regular street of nests on both sides, at about two inches' distance from each other, and containing under its roof several hundred, or a thousand birds. The termites, or white ants, which do no injury to the wood, as in the East Indies, but only to the grass, the destruction of which they occasion by raising a number of hills, which impede the progress of vegetation. The Hottentots eat them; and this food is found to be far from disagreeable. The locusts also are esteemed excellent food by the Boshmans, by whom they are dried and kept for use. The black, or rock scorpion, is nearly as venomous here as any of the serpent tribe, of which there are numerous kinds. There are six species about the Cape; namely, the horned snake, about 18 inches long, the most poisonous of them all; the kouseband, or garter snake, about the same length, dangerous to travellers on account of resembling the soil so much in colour, that it is not readily perceived; the yellow snake, which differs in colour only from the hooded snake of India, and being from four to eight feet in length, their size, and bright yellow colour, renders it easy to avoid them; the puff adder, about 40 inches in length, so called from blowing itself up to near a foot in circumference; the spring adder, very dangerous, but not common, from three to four feet long, and of a jet black with white spots; and the night snake, more beautiful than any of the others, about 20 inches long, very thin, belted with black, red, and yellow, and when near, at night, has the appearance of fire. The country of the Hottentots lies between the tropic of Capricorn, and 35 degrees S. lat. and is bounded on the W. S. and E. by the Atlantic and Indian Oceans, and on the N. by regions very little, if at all, explored.

HOVAL, or Oualo, a kingdom of Africa, on the banks of the Senegal, extending about 90 miles from E. to W. and 18 from N. to S. The soil is fertile in maize, rice, legumes, indigo, tobacco, and cotton; the meadows feed great numbers of large and small cattle, whose flesh is excellent; game is plentiful, and birds are in the greatest number and variety, and the forests abound with palm-trees.

HOY, s. [hou, old Fr.] a small vessel, whose sails are neither square nor cross, like other ships, but mizen, so that she can sail nearer the wind than another vessel can.

HOY, one of the Orkney Islands, situated between the Island of Pomona and the N. coast of Caithness-shire. It is about 11 miles long, and more than 3 broad. On this island, besides the great conic hill of Hoyhead, which is a sea-mark, there is a stupendous rock, called the Beary, where a bird, here named the layer, supposed to be a species of the penguin, is found. It is about the size of a small duck, remarkably fat, and esteemed a great delicacy. These birds burrow in the rabbit holes. The person employed in taking the young is usually let down by a rope from the top of the precipice. In this island too, in a gloomy valley, is an entire stone, 36 feet long, and 18 broad, called the Dwarfie Stone. It is hollow within, having the form of a bed and pillow cut in the stone: it is supposed to have been once the habitation of a hermit. Lat. 58. 56. N. lon. 3. 20. W.

HU'DDERSFIELD, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, which has risen to consequence within this century. It is a sort of mart for narrow cloths, fine and coarse, fine broad cloths, serges, kerseymers, &c. and is situated on the Calder, amid barren moors, 25 miles N. E. of Manchester, 42 S. W. of York, and 189 N. N. W. of London. Its market is on Tuesday, when the cloth is exposed for sale in a large hall, and merchants and wool-staplers attend from a considerable distance. Inhabitants, in 1811, 9671.

To HU'DDLE, v. a. to dress up close, in order to disguise; to dress in a hurry, or put one's clothes on carelessly and in haste. Figuratively, to cover up in haste; to perform in a hurry; to join together in a confused and improper manner. Neuterly, to come in a croud or hurry.

HU'DDLE, s. a confused crowd or mixture; a crowd assembled together in a hurry; a tumult.

HU'DSON'S BAY, a large bay of North America, lying between 51 and 67 degrees of N. latitude, and discovered, in 1610, by Captain Henry Hudson. This intrepid mariner, in searching for a N. W. passage to the South Sea, discovered three straits, through which he hoped to find out a new way to Asia by America. He had made two voyages before on the same adventure; the first in 1607, and the second in 1608. In this third and last, in 1610, he entered the straits that lead into this new Mediterranean, the bay known by his name; and coasted a great part of it. His ardour for the discovery not being abated by the difficulties he struggled with in this empire of winter, and world of frost and snow, he staid here till the ensuing spring, and prepared, in the beginning of 1611, to pursue his discoveries; but his crew, who suffered equal hardships, without the same spirit to support them, mutinied, seized upon him, and seven of those who were most faithful to him, and committed them to the icy seas in an open boat. Hudson and his companions were never more heard of; but the ship, and the rest of the men, returned home. Other attempts towards a discovery were also made in 1612 and 1667. In 1746, a captain Ellis wintered as far north as 57 degrees and a half; and a Captain Christopher attempted farther discoveries in 1761. The country lying round Hudson's Bay on the W. and S. W. is called New North and New South Wales. The extensive peninsula to the E. of it is called Labradore, or New Britain. The entrance of the Bay from the ocean, after leaving Cape Farewell and Davis' Straits, is between Resolution Isles on the N. and Button's Isles on the S. forming the eastern extremity of the straits, distinguished by the name of its first discoverer. The vast countries that surround Hudson's Bay abound with animals, whose skins and furs are far superior in quality to those found in less northerly regions. In 1670, a charter was granted to a company, which does not consist of above ten persons, for the exclusive trade to this bay, and for planting the country; and they have acted under it ever since with great benefit to themselves, but little comparative advantage to the kingdom at large. Of late years, however, the fur trade, from the inland parts, has been carried on to a much greater extent than it was before. This has been chiefly occasioned by the interference of the Canada traders, who had effectually supplanted the company on the seashore, supplying the natives with every convenience for war and domestic uses. This induced the company, in 1773, to begin their inland voyages, and now the Canadians from Canada, and the Europeans from Hudson's Bay, frequently meet together. The servants of the company, however, imported principally from the Orkney Isles, having ingratiated themselves into the confidence of the natives, from their prudent proper behaviour, and incorruptible honesty, have evidently the advantage of trade on their side. They consequently export a greater quantity of furs, (in proportion to the goods imported,) and these in better perservation and more valuable. They employ 4 ships and about 130 seamen, and have several forts; namely, Prince of Wales' Fort, Churchill River; York Fort, Nelson River; New Severn; and Albany; which are all seated on the W. S. W. side of the Bay.

HU'DSON'S RIVER, one of the finest rivers in North America, rising in a mountainous country, in the N. E. part of the state of New York, about half way between the Lakes Ontario and Champlain. It waters Albany and Hudson, and proceeds in a southerly direction, almost its whole course, to the Atlantic Ocean, which it enters at York Bay, 10 miles S. of New York, after a course of 250 miles. The tide flows a few miles above Albany, which is 160 miles from New York. It is navigable for sloops of 70 or 80 tons to Albany, and for ships to Hudson.

To HULK, v. a. to pull out the entrails of animals. "To hulk a hare." Ainsw.

HULL, s. [from helan, Sax.] the husk or outward covering of corn or any other thing. The body of a ship. Though hulk and hull be now used promiscuously, hulk seems, according to Johnson, to have been formerly applied not only to the body or hull, but likewise to a whole ship of burden.

To HULL, v. n. to float; to drive to and fro upon the water without sails or rudder. "He looked, and saw the ark hull on the flood." Par. Lost.

HULL, or Kingston-upon-Hull, a large, closely built, well-paved, and populous town, in the E. Riding of Yorkshire, seated on a river called the Hull, which rises not far from Driffield, and here enters the river Humber. Its commerce has been constantly increasing so much of late years, that it is now probably become the fourth port in the kingdom. Its situation is extremely advantageous; for, besides its communication with the Yorkshire rivers and canals, it has access also, by the Humber, to the Trent, and all its branches and communications. Hence it has the import and export trade of many of the northern and midland counties. By the late inland navigation, it has also a communication with the rivers Mersey, Dee, Ribble, Severn, Thames, Avon, &c. which navigation, including its windings, extends above 500 miles in the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, York, Lancaster, Westmoreland, Chester, Stafford, Warwick, Leicester, Oxford, Worcester, &c. The foreign trade is chiefly to the Baltic; but it has also a regular traffic with the southern parts of Europe, and with America. More ships are sent hence to Greenland, than from any other port, that of London excepted. The harbour is chiefly artificial, consisting of a dock, the largest in the kingdom, (finished in 1778) with which the river communicates, and in which 800 ships may ride safely and conveniently. Among the public buildings are, the Trinity house, for the relief of seamen and their widows; an exchange; and a town-hall. The grand stone bridge over the river, to Holderness, was rebuilt in 1787, and consists of 14 arches. It is 36 miles S. E. of York, and 170 by Barton, 198 by South Cave, and 232 by Market-Weighton, N. of London. Markets on Tuesday and Saturday. Population in 1821, 38,856.

HU'NGARY, a kingdom of Europe, lying along the river Danube, about 600 miles in length, and about 250 in breadth. It is bounded on the N. by Poland, on the W. by Germany, and on the E. and S. by Turkey in Europe. It comprehends three large provinces, namely, Proper Hungary, which is bounded on the N. by Poland, on the W. by the circle of Austria, on the S. by the river Drave, which separates it from Sclavonia, and by the Danube, which parts it from Turkey in Europe; and on the E. by Wallachia and Transylvania. The other parts are Transylvania and Sclavonia. The principal rivers are, the Danube, the Save, the Drave, the Tresse, the Maros, the Raab, the Waag, the Gran, and the Zarwiese. They are so full of fish, that they give them to the hogs; but the waters are all unwholesome, except that of the Danube. The air is very unhealthy, occasioned by the lakes and bogs, insomuch that there is a sort of plague visits them every three or four years, on which account it is called the grave of the Germans. It abounds in all the necessities of life, and the wine, especially that called Tokay, is excellent. There are mines of gold, silver, copper, and iron; and they have such plenty of game, that hunting is allowed to all. The inhabitants are well-shaped, brave, haughty, and revengeful. Their horsemen are called Husars, and their foot Heydukes. Almost all the towns of Hungary have two names, the one German and the other Hungarian, and the language is a dialect of the Slavonian. The government is hereditary in the house of Austria, and the established religion is popery, though there are a great number of Protestants, who have here been severely persecuted, but who now have toleration. No country in the world is better supplied with mineral waters and baths; and those of Buda, when the Turks had it in possession, were reckoned the finest in Europe. Buda is the capital town of Lower Hungary, and Presburg of the Upper.

HUNT, s. a pack of hounds. A chase after wild animals. Pursuit.

HUNTER, s. [hunta, Isl.] one who chases animals for pleasure or exercise; a dog that scents, or is used in pursuing, beasts of prey; a swift and strong horse, that is fit to follow the chase.

HUNTING, s. the exercise or diversion of pursuing fourfooted beasts of game. With us this is chiefly performed with dogs; and the chases are, the hart, buck, roe, hare, fox, badger, and otter.

HUNTINGDON, called by the Saxons Hunter's Down, the county town of Huntingdonshire, has two churches, several good inns, a handsome market-place, and a good grammar-school. It was once very large, having 15 churches, which in Camden's time were reduced to 4, and now to 2; but it is still a populous, trading place. It is seated on the river Ouse, over which it has a handsome stone bridge, leading to Godmanchester, on the great N. road, 16 miles W. by N. of Cambridge, and 58 N. by W. of London. Markets on Monday and Saturday.

HUNTINGDONSHIRE, a county of England, bounded on the W. and N. by Northamptonshire, on the N. E. and E. by Cambridgeshire, and on the S. by a part of Cambridgeshire and Bedfordshire. It extends 22 miles from N. to S. and about 18 from E. to W. The principal rivers are the Ouse and Nen. It is divided into 4 hundreds, which contained, in 1811, 5 market towns, 78 parishes, 279 villages, and 20,402 male and 21,806 female inhabitants. The borders of the Ouse, which flow across the S. E. part, consist of fertile and very beautiful meadows. The middle and western parts are finely varied on their surface, fertile in corn, and sprinkled with woods. The whole upland part was a forest, peculiarly adapted for hunting; whence the name of the county took its rise. The N. E. part consists of fens, which join those of Ely; but they are drained, so as to afford rich pasturage for cattle, and even large crops of corn. The air is good, except in the fenny parts, which are aguish. Its chief commodities are corn, malt, and cheese; and they fatten abundance of cattle.

HUNTING-HORN, s. a bugle; a horn used to cheer the hounds.

HUNTRESS, s. a woman that follows the chase, or pursues animals for sport.

I & J.

I Is the ninth letter, and third vowel, of the alphabet. Its sound varies; in some words it is long, as in fine, shine, thine, which are usually marked with e final, but not always, as in high, mind, sign, &c. in some short, as in thin, win, sin, bid, hid, &c. In others, it is pronounced like y, as in collier, onion, &c. When prefixed to e, it makes a diphthong of the same sound with the soft i, or ee; thus, field, yield, are spoken as feeld, yeeld; it has the same sound in machine, magazine, &c. Subjoined to a or e, it makes them long, as fail, neigh, &c. No English words end in i, e being either added to it, or else the i turned into a y. I consonant has invariably the same sound with that of g in giant, genius, &c. as jade, jump, jerk, &c. I, as a numeral, stands for only one, and so many units as it is repeated times, as I, II, III, is one, two, three; and when put before a higher numeral, subtracts itself, as IV, four; IX, nine, &c. but when set after it, so many are added; thus, VI, is 5 and 1, or six; VII, 5 and 2, or seven; VIII, 5 and 3, or eight. The ancient Romans likewise used ic for 500; dic for 1000; iccc for 5000; icccccc for 10,000; icccccc for 50,000; and icccccc for 100,000. Farther than this they did not go in their notation, but repeated the last number; as, icccicccccc, for 200,000, and so on.

I, pronoun personal, [Sax.] used by a person when speaking of, or describing an action to, himself. Sometimes it is used instead of ay, yea, or yes; from ia, Sax. "I, Sir, she took them and read them in my presence." Shak.

To JA'BBER, v. n. [gabberen, Belg.] to talk idly, or without thinking; to prate or chatter; to talk inarticulately, so as not to be understood.

JA'CKSON, PORT, a large bay on the coast of New South Wales, about 12 miles N. of Cape Banks, thought to be the finest harbour in the world. The capes at its entrance, which is less than 2 miles across, are high perpendicular cliffs, and within it gradually expands into a noble basin, with soundings sufficient for the largest vessels, and space to accommodate, in perfect security, a greater number than ever were assembled at one station. Ships may lie in $5\frac{1}{2}$ fathoms, within 50 yards of the shore, and the channel, (the surface of which is as smooth as a fish-pond) has mostly 15 fathoms, gradually shoaling farther up. It runs, chiefly in a western direction, about 13 miles into the country, and contains at least a hundred small coves, formed by narrow necks of land, the projections of which afford complete shelter from all winds. Sydney Cove lies on the S. side of the harbour, between 5 and 6 miles from the entrance. There is an abundance of fish in the harbour, most of which are unknown in England, besides oysters, cockles, and other shell fish.

JA'COB'S LADDER, s. the same with the Greek valerian.

JA'COB'S STAFF, s. a pilgrim's staff, so called from the pilgrimage made to St. James at Compostella. In Astronomy, a cross staff, used for taking heights, so called in allusion to the ladder in Jacob's dream.

JA'COBINE MONKS, the same as the Dominicans. Also the name given to the party in France who were most zealous in giving the revolution a turn towards republicanism, and the government of terror and cruelty; so called from their assembling in a house formerly inhabited by the Jacobin friars. The name of a pigeon with a high tuft.

JA'COBINISM, s. the principles of a Jacobin: generally applied to the French revolutionists.

JA'COBITE, s. a name given to those who adhered to the interest of king James II. and his family.

JACO'BUS, s. an ancient gold coin worth 25 shillings.

JACTITA'TION, s. [jactitio, Lat.] tossing motion; restlessness; heaving: a term, in the Canon law, for a false pretension to marriage.

JACULA'TION, s. [jaculatio, Lat.] the act of throwing a dart or other missile weapon.

JADE, s. [etymology doubtful] a horse of no spirit or value; a tired horse. Figuratively, a woman of bad character; generally used as a term of contempt, noting sometimes age, generally vice; but when applied to a young woman, it expresses rather irony than reproach. In Natural History, a species of jasper, of extreme hardness, of a colour composed of a pale bluish gray, or ash colour, and a pale green intermixed. It is used by the Turks for handles of sabres.

To JADE, v. a. to tire or make weary; to overbear, or harass like a horse that is overriden. To ride or tyrannize over.

JA'DISH, a. used with trick, mischievous, applied to the qualities of a vicious horse. Unchaste, applied to women.

JA'FFA, an ancient decayed town of Asia, on the coast of Palestine, formerly called JOPPA. The inhabitants are Turks or Arabs, with a mixture of Greeks, Maronites, and Armenians. The houses are small, and surrounded with the ruins of the ancient walls and towers. The ancient harbour is destroyed, but there is a good road. Here pilgrims, &c. pay for permission to visit the Holy Land. The whole coast from hence to Damietta, in Egypt, is entirely desert and wild, without a single port. It is 50 miles N. W. of Jerusalem. Lat. 31. 45. N. lon. 35. 55. E.

To JAGG, v. a. [gagaw, slits or holes, Brit.] to hack or cut into slits and notches, like the teeth of a saw.

JAGG, s. any thing resembling the teeth of a saw; an escalop.

JA'GGY, (the g pron. hard) a. of an uneven surface; having its extremities resembling the teeth of a saw.

JA'GGEDNESS, (the g pron. hard) s. unevenness at the extremity; having its extremities resembling the teeth of a saw.

JA'GO, ST. one of the largest, most populous, best cultivated, and most fertile, of the Cape de Verd Islands, on the coast of Africa. It lies about six leagues westward of the island of Mayo, and is about 60 miles in circumference. The people, in general, are black, or, at best, of a mixed colour, except a few of the better rank. Cotton is produced in such abundance in this island, that, besides the large quantities sent to the Brazils, and sold by the Portuguese to the other European nations, the natives are, in general, clothed with this manufacture. Here are vines, of which they make a wine that is not contemptible; but as they are supplied with better by the European shipping, it has fallen into disrepute. The chief fruits of the island, besides a profusion of plantains, are citrons, lemons, oranges, musk and water melons, limes, bananas, guavas, pomegranates, pom-pions, quinces, custard-apples, papas, tamarinds, pine-apples, cocoa-nuts, tar-apples, and sugar-canes. The animals are cows, horses, asses, mules, deer, goats, hogs, civet-cats, and black-faced well-proportioned monkeys with long tails. Of the feathered kind, there are cocks, hens, ducks, Guinea hens, both tame and wild, parroquets, parrots, pigeons, turtle doves, crab-catchers, curlews, and a great variety of others, valuable only for their plumage. They have also some cedar trees, and plenty of Indian corn. It is, in general, very high land; but were it not for the continual rains in the time of the travadoes, which render it unpleasant, and unwholesome to strangers, it would be as delightful an island as any in the world. The chief towns are St. Jago and Praya. Lat. 14. 54. N. lon. 23. 30. W.

JAIL, s. formerly written jaole, of geol, Fr. [See GAOL] a place where criminals or debtors are confined.

JA'ILBIRD, s. a person who has been confined in a prison for some time.

JA'ILER, s. one who has the care of a prison.

JAKES, s. [of uncertain etymology] a place where persons answer the calls of nature, and deposit their excrements; a privy; called by the Londoners a house of office.

JA'LAP, s. [jalap, Fr. jalopium low Lat.] a firm and solid root, of a wrinkled surface, a faintish smell, and acrid taste. It is an excellent purge in all cases where serous humours are to be evacuated; was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and received its name Jalap, or Jalop, from Xalapa, a town in New Spain, near which it was discovered.

JAM, s. [the etymology unknown] a tart, or conserve of fruits boiled with sugar and water.

JAMAICA, an island of the West Indies, discovered by Christopher Columbus, in 1494; 37 miles S. of Cuba, and 50 W. of St. Domingo. It is about 120 miles in length, and 42 where broadest. It is of an oval figure, and grows narrower from the middle, till it terminates in two points at the extremities of the island. It contains between 4 and 5,000,000 of acres, and is divided by a ridge of hills which runs nearly from E. to W. from sea to sea. Here abundance of fine rivers take their rise, and flow from both sides in gentle streams, refreshing the valleys, as they glide along, and furnishing the inhabitants with sweet and cool water. They are well stored with excellent fish of various kinds, not known in Europe; and they have eels and crawfish in great plenty, not unlike ours. None of these rivers are navigable even for barges; but some of them are so large, that the sugars are carried upon them in canoes from the remote plantations to the sea-side; others of them run under ground for a considerable space, particularly the Rio Corbe and the Rio Pedra. The mountains, and indeed the greatest part of the island, are covered with woods, which never lose their verdure, but look green at all times of the year; for here is a perennial spring. There are a thousand different kinds of trees adorning the brow of every hill, irregularly mixing their different branches, appearing in gay confusion, and forming groves and cool retreats. Among these are the lignum vitæ, the cedar, and the mahogany trees. In the valleys are sugar-canes, and such a variety of fruit trees, as to make the country look like a paradise. But to balance these advantages, there are dreadful alligators in the rivers; guanoes and galliwasps in the fens and marshes; and snakes and noxious animals in the mountains. The days and nights are almost of an equal length all the year round. There are two springs or seasons for planting grain, and the year is distinguished into two seasons, the wet and the dry. July, August, and September, are called the hurricane months, because then these dreadful tempests are most frequent, and there is lightning almost every night. Not above one half of the island is cultivated, all the plantations being by the sea side. Here and there are savannas, or large plains, where the original natives used to plant their Indian corn, and which the Spaniards afterwards made use of for breeding their cattle; but these are now quite bare and barren. The houses are generally built low, being only one story, on account of the hurricanes and earthquakes; and the negroes live in huts made of reeds, which hold only two or three persons. The common drink is Madeira wine, or rum punch. The common bread, or that which serves for it, is plantains, yams, and cassava roots. The yams are like potatoes, only coarser, and of a much larger size. But in 1793, a great number of the bread-fruit trees were brought here from the island of Otaheite, by Captain Bligh, in the Providence frigate. The cinnamon-tree thrives here extremely well: the first of these trees seen in that part of the world, was obtained out of a French ship captured by Admiral Rodney; this yielded seeds in abundance, and many plants have been raised from them, which prosper exceedingly in the cultivated parts of the island. Hogs are plentiful, and their mutton and lamb pretty good; but the servants generally feed upon Irish salt-beef, and the negroes have herrings and salt fish. The current coin is all Spanish money. The general produce of this island is sugar, rum, ginger, cotton, indigo, pimento, chocolate, several kinds of woods, and medicinal drugs. They have some tobacco, which is but indifferent, and used only by the negroes. They have no sorts of European grain; but they have Indian corn, Guinea corn, and pease of various kinds, but none like ours; with variety of roots. Fruits are in great plenty, such as Seville and China oranges, common and sweet lemons, shadocks, citrons, pomegranates, marmos, soursops, papas, pine-apples, star-apples, prickly pears, alicada pears, melons, pompions, guavas, and many other sorts. The common distempers are, fevers, fluxes, and the dry gripes. Jamaica is divided into three counties, Middlesex, Surry, and Cornwall, which contain six towns and 27 villages. The legislature consists of a governor, appointed by the king; a council; and a house of assembly. In 1787, the number of negroes amounted to about 250,000, the whites to 30,000, the freed negroes and people of colour to 10,000, and the Maroons (who have been since transported to Nova Scotia) to 1400. In the same year the exports amounted, in the whole, to the sum of 2,136,442*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* sterling, at the current London prices, and the imports to the sum of 1,496,232*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* The principal town is Kingston; but St. Jago de la Vega, or Spanish town, is the seat of government. In 1655, Jamaica was taken from the Spaniards by the English, under Penn and Venables.

JAMB, s. [jambe, a leg, Fr.] any supporter, particularly applied to those on each side a door, &c.

IA'MBIC, s. [iambicus, Lat.] verses composed of iambic feet, or a short and long syllable; and being generally used in satirical compositions, is figuratively applied to signify satire.

JAMES VI. of Scotland succeeded to the English throne by the name of James I. upon the death of queen Elizabeth, March 24, 1603, being then in the 37th year of his age, and having been king of Scotland ever since he was a year old, on the deposition of queen Mary his mother, who was the daughter of James V. son to James IV. by Margaret eldest daughter of our king Henry VII. He set out from Edinburgh April 5th, and was received with such extravagant expressions of joy, as soon as he set foot in England, that an honest Scotchman said bluntly, "This people will spoil a good king;" and the king issued out a proclamation, to restrain the people from flocking to him in such numbers. On the 7th of May he arrived in London, having in his journey made about 200 knights; and soon after his arrival he made many more, and indeed was very liberal in conferring titles of all kinds. On the 19th of March the Parliament met, when he recommended to them very strongly the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland: but the king's partiality to his Scotch courtiers so raised the jealousy of the English, that it came to nothing. The commons, on June 6, presented an address to the king, complaining of certain grievances, representing their privileges, which they supposed him not thoroughly acquainted with, because he had interfered in the debates about controverted elections, which they claimed the sole privilege of determining. But this address he took so ill, that soon after he prorogued the parliament to February. In the mean time he concluded a peace with Spain. The parliament, which was to have met in February, 1605, was farther prorogued to Nov. 5, when a plot was discovered of a design to blow up the Parliament-house; 36 barrels of gunpowder being put in a cellar, under the lords-house, which had been hired for that purpose, and covered over with coals, billets, and faggots. Guy Faux, who was to have set fire to the train, was discovered in a cloak and boots, with a dark lanthorn, tinder-box, and matches, in his pocket. Himself with his accomplices were executed in January following; as were, not long after, Oldcorn and Garnet, two Jesuits, for concealing and abetting the plot. In 1607, a new translation of the Bible, viz. that now in use, was begun, and published in 1611. Matters did not go very smooth between the king and the parliament in 1610. The commons began to complain of several grievances, such as the king's profuseness in enriching his courtiers, especially the Scots, his regard to the Roman Catholics, and the rigorous proceedings of the high commission court. The king sent for both houses, and endeavoured to vindicate himself in a speech; in which, however, he used such extravagant expressions concerning the kingly power, as were more agreeable to an absolute monarchy than the English constitution. During this session, Henry, the king's eldest son, was created prince of Wales, as prince Charles had a good while before been duke of York. Upon Henry IV. king of France, being stabbed by Ravallac, at the instigation of the Jesuits, king James by a fresh proclamation banished all Jesuits and priests out of the kingdom, and forbade all recusants, that is, such as refused to take the new oath of allegiance, to come within ten miles of the court. Robert Cecil, a man of great abilities, had been prime minister from the beginning of his reign; though all that while the king had, properly speaking, no particular favourite; but in 1611, he took into his good graces a young Scotch gentleman, of about 20 years of age, whose name was Robert Carr. He was a person of but small parts, and no learning, but airy and gay, and of a comely and graceful presence; qualities very taking with king James. The king made him a gentleman of his bed-chamber, and some time after treasurer of Scotland, baron of Branspeth, and viscount Rochester; making him also a privy counsellor and knight of the garter; and nothing was done at court without the advice of the viscount Rochester. The latter end of the year 1612, Frederic V. elector palatine, came into England to marry the princess Elizabeth, the king's only daughter. On November 6, this year, died, in the 19th year of his age, Henry prince of Wales, of whom historians give an extraordinary character. Feb. 5, 1613, the marriage between the elector and the princess was solemnized, on which occasion there was a continued course of entertainments, balls, masquerades, and other diversions, at court, till April, when the illustrious pair set out for Germany. There having been no parliament these four years, the king and his ministers were continually inventing new ways to raise money, as by monopolies, benevolences, loans, and other illegal methods, which occasioned great murmurs and complaints. Among other expedients, he sold titles; made a number of knights of Nova Scotia, each of which paid him such a sum; and instituted a new order of knights baronets, a sort of middle nobility between barons and knights bachelors, which was to be hereditary; for which honour each person paid 1095*l*. But the king still wanting money, a parliament was called, which met on April 16, 1614. The commons, instead of granting money first, as was expected, fell presently upon grievances; such as the ill uses made of the revenue; the increase of papists by the encouragement of the court, monopolies, and levying money without consent of parliament: upon which grievances they resolved to present an address: but the king, not liking such proceedings, dissolved the parliament. June 7, without one statute being enacted. In 1615, the king was taken with a new object, George Villiers, which cooled his affection for his old favourite, and his ruin was completed by the discovery of the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. By the disgrace of Somerset, Villiers became sole favourite. The king soon created him lord Weddon, viscount Villiers, and earl of Buckingham. His mother, though a papist, was created countess of Buckingham; and she governing her son as he governed the king, the papists met with great encouragement, and began to swarm in the kingdom. He was soon after made marquis of Buckingham, and lord high admiral, though he had never been at sea, but between Dover and Calais. The king having the most extravagant notions of his prerogative, and being wholly influenced by this vain, inexperienced, and presumptuous young man, it is no wonder that the rest of this reign, like the former, was one continued scene of mismanagement. By this means two parties were formed in the nation; one for the court, and the other for the people. Prince Charles, now the king's only son, was created prince of Wales in 1616. The king was desirous of marrying him, and a negotiation, which lasted several years, was carried on with the court of Spain, for a marriage between him and the infanta, daughter of Philip III. king of Spain; during which time Gondemar, the Spanish ambassador in England, had vast influence at court. The king, being in want of money, delivered up, to the states of the United Provinces, the cautionary towns, Brill, Rammekins, and Flushing, which were put into queen Elizabeth's hands, as a security for the repayment of the expenses she had been at, for 2,728,000 florins, in lieu of a debt of 8,000,000, which they were obliged to pay the late queen or her successors, besides 18 years' interest for the same. In 1619, queen Anne, the king's consort, died of a dropsy, in the 46th year of her age. In 1619 the states of Bohemia, who were mostly protestants, refusing to own Ferdinand, who had been elected emperor, as their sovereign, chose Frederic, elector palatine, son-in-law to king James, for their king, who was crowned on November 4, following. A war ensuing, king James refused to assist his son-in-law, who in the battle of Prague, Nov. 7, 1620, was totally routed by the Imperial and Bavarian troops, and forced to fly with his queen and children into Holland. The murmurs of the people about the palatine, occasioned the calling of a parliament, which met Jan. 30, 1621. The king, in order to get money, made as if he would have recourse to arms, if other methods failed; and the commons, that they might not seem to be wanting in their zeal for what they so much desired, granted him two subsidies; but afterwards, when they saw no preparations making for the war, and yet more money was demanded, instead of readily granting it, they drew up a remonstrance about the increase of popery at home, the state of the protestant religion abroad, by the neglect of vigorously interposing in the defence of the palatinate, and against the Spanish match. Upon this the commons drew up a petition, and presented it with the remonstrance. The former he received, but rejected the latter, and sent them a long and angry answer to their petition, charging them with usurping upon his prerogative royal, and meddling with things far above their reach; and in the end, objected to their calling their privileges their ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, and wished they had rather acknowledged them as derived from the grace and permission of his ancestors and himself. This the commons would by no means admit; and, therefore, knowing the parliament was going to be dissolved or prorogued, drew up a protestation concerning their privileges, maintaining them to be their undoubted birth-right. The king hereupon sent for the clerk of the house of commons, and commanded him to produce the journal book; which he having done accordingly, the king with his own hand, in full council, took the said protestation out of the journal, declaring it to be invalid, null, void, and of no effect. Soon after he dissolved the parliament by proclamation, and committed to prison several of the members who were most active in maintaining their privileges. This open opposition between the king and parliament produced the two parties, who in after times came to be distinguished by the names of Tories and Whigs. On Feb. 19, 1625, the parliament met, and the king apprehending that a war would ensue on the breaking off the Spanish match, made such a speech to them as the prince, and Buckingham, who now affected the patriot, desired. They unanimously advised him to break off the match, though the business had been done before, and gave largely for the war. The king died at Theobalds, March 27, 1625. In the beginning of this king's reign, a new officer, called master of the ceremonies, was instituted, for the more solemn reception of ambassadors. James I. was in his stature of the middle size, inclining to corpulency; his forehead was high, his beard scanty, and his aspect mean. His eyes, which were large and languid, he rolled about incessantly, as if in quest of novelties. His tongue was so large, that in speaking or drinking he beslobbered the bystanders. His knees were so weak as to bend under the weight of his body. His address was awkward, and his appearance slovenly. There was nothing dignified either in the composition of his mind or person. In the course of his reign he exhibited repeated instances of his ridiculous vanity, prejudices, profusion, folly, and littleness of soul. All that we can add in his favour is, that he was averse to cruelty and injustice, very little addicted to excess, temperate in his meals, kind to his subjects, and even desirous of acquiring the love of his people, by granting that as a favour which they claimed as a privilege. His reign, though ignoble to himself, was happy to his people. They were enriched by commerce, which no war interrupted. They felt no severe impositions; and the commons made considerable progress in ascertaining the liberties of the nation. In this and the preceding reign England produced a number of excellent poets, such as Spencer, Sidney, Shakspeare, and Jonson; while Bacon excelled in natural philosophy, and Camden flourished as an antiquarian and historian. In the 14th year of this reign, Sir Hugh Middleton, a private citizen of London, supplied part of the city with excellent water, conveyed in an aqueduct from Ware in Hertfordshire, now known by the name of the New River.

JAMES II. succeeded to the throne of England, Feb. 6, 1684-5, on the death of his brother Charles II. There had been endeavours used to exclude him, by an act of parliament, from the crown, on account of his being a Roman catholic; but the king his brother dissolving the parliament, prevented its passing. On April 23, 1685, the king and queen were crowned. The king would not receive the sacrament, but all the rest was done in the protestant form; his priests doubtless dispensing with him in this, as well as in the coronation oath. The famous Titus Oates was tried the 8th and 9th of May, before lord chief justice Jefferies, for perjury, in relation to two circumstances of his evidence. The witnesses against him were almost all papists, and seminary priests and Jesuits from St. Omer's. He was sentenced to pay 1000 marks on each indictment, to be stripped of his canonical habit, to stand twice in the pillory, and five times a year afterwards as long as he lived; to be imprisoned for life, and to be whipped first from Aldgate to Newgate, and the very next day but one from Newgate to Tyburn; which was executed with the utmost severity, so that he swooned away several times. Thomas Dangerfield was tried soon after, and sentenced to pay 500*l.* to stand twice in the pillory, and to be whipped in the same manner as Oates; which was executed, though with less severity. In England, the parliament (the only one in this king's reign) met May 19, when his majesty promised to preserve the religious and civil rights of his people. The beginning of king James's reign was disturbed by two invasions (one in Scotland, headed by the duke of Argyle, the other in England, in favour of the duke of Monmouth,) the authors of which were both taken and beheaded, the latter in England, and the former in Scotland. Judge Jefferies was sent down into the west to try the prisoners; where he boasted he had hanged more men than all the judges since William the Conqueror. Now every method was taken to establish popery. In Ireland, the privy-council was dissolved, and a new one appointed, with several papists in it, who soon became the majority. Protestant officers were cashiered, and papists put in their room, and the army so modelled by the earl of Tyrconnel, as best to suit the purpose in view. The parliament, after several adjournments, met Nov. 9. The king demanded a supply for keeping up his army, which he had increased to 15,000 men, though the nation was in perfect peace; and bade them not to take exceptions that he had some officers in his army not qualified according to the late tests, declaring his resolution to employ them still. Both houses, and the whole kingdom, were surprised at this speech, and the opposers of the late bill of exclusion began now a little to open their eyes. The commons indeed voted him a supply, but could not relish the employing popish officers in the army, contrary to the known law of the land: and addressed the king against it; at which he was so much offended, that he prorogued the parliament, Nov. 20. All the rest of king James's reign, till he met with a providential check from the enterprise of the prince of Orange, was wholly employed in measures to make himself absolute, and to establish popery. In April, 1686, he wrote a letter to the parliament of Scotland, desiring them to free his Roman catholic subjects from the restraints they lay under; and upon their not complying, he dissolved them. In England he got the judges to declare in favour of his dispensing power. This he effected by sending for them one by one, and talking with them privately in his closet, (whence the odious name of closeting took its rise,) by turning out those whom he found refractory, and filling their places with others he found more pliable. He also new-modelled his council, admitting into it the lord Arundel of Wardour, and the lord Bellasyse, who had been both impeached for the popish plot, and other Roman catholics, among whom was Father Peter, his confessor. And now every thing was hurrying on to establish the Roman catholic religion. The king had an army of 15,000 men encamped on Hounslow heath, under the earl of Feversham; and in the camp was a public chapel, where mass was said every day. This seemed plainly to indicate, that he intended to make use of force, if he could not bring his measures to bear without it; which put the Rev. Mr. Johnson upon publishing an address to the protestant officers and soldiers in the army, exhorting them not to be the tools of the court for subverting their religion and liberties. For this, after having been solemnly degraded, he was whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, stood thrice in the pillory, and fined 500 marks; but this writing being dispersed in the army, made such an impression, that it tended not a little to the defection that happened in it afterwards. The king's zeal also put him upon sending the earl of Castlemain on a solemn embassy to the pope, in order to reconcile the three nations to the holy see. But Innocent XI. happening to be troubled with a periodical cough, which always seized him when the earl was to have an audience, his lordship threatened to depart; whereupon his holiness very complaisantly sent him word, "that if he had a mind to go, he would advise him to set out early in the morning, and rest at noon; because it was dangerous to travel in that country in the heat of the day." In the beginning of the year 1687, the king sent his declaration into Scotland, suspending, by virtue of his sovereign authority, prerogative royal, and absolute power, all laws against the catholics; and, April 4, he published the like declaration for liberty of conscience in England, only not quite in so high a style. He sent mandates to admit Roman catholics into preferments in the university of Oxford. He did all he could to gain the members of parliament; but not succeeding, he dissolved them on July 2: and finding such a general aversion in the nation to popery and arbitrary power, he never durst venture to call another parliament. On July 3, Ferdinand Dada, who had been about the king's person ever since his accession, being invested with the character of the pope's nuncio in England, made his public entry at Windsor, with all the formality of a popish procession. On Jan. 2, 1687-8, a proclamation was published, that the queen was with child, and ordering a thanksgiving on that account. The king now despairing of every method but force, began to augment his army and fleet, and the new commissions were almost all bestowed on popish officers. He afterwards ordered some entire regiments from Ireland. On April 22, 1688, came out a second declaration for liberty of conscience, which the bishops were ordered to see read in all churches and chapels. Some of the bishops obeyed, and it was read in a few churches, when the congregations generally went out. But the archbishop of Canterbury, and six other bishops, resolved not to obey the order, and went and presented a petition to the king against it. They were upon this, June 8, summoned before the council, and, adhering to their petition, were sent to the Tower, privately as it were, by water; but this did not hinder multitudes flocking to the water-side, desiring their blessing, and applauding and encouraging their constancy. Two days after, June 10, the queen was said to be delivered of a prince (the late pretender.) On June 15, the seven bishops were tried for a libel against the king and government, and were acquitted: upon which an universal joy ran through the nation, and the army shouted for it in the king's hearing. The king was now willing to try how far he could depend upon the army. Beginning with lord Litchfield's regiment, he ordered them to take their arms, and immediately commanded such officers and soldiers as would not contribute to the repeal of the penal laws and test, to lay them down; which they all did, except two captains and a few popish soldiers; at which he was so astonished, that he stood speechless for some time, and then bade them take up their arms again; adding, with a sullen air, that he would not hereafter do them the honour to ask their advice. And now he began to new model the army, by cashiering protestants, and putting papists in their room; but this only disgusted the army the more. The fleet was no better disposed to favour the views of the king; for vice-admiral Strickland, attempting to have mass said on board his ship, it occasioned such a disturbance among the sailors, that they were with difficulty restrained from throwing the priest overboard. Now the nation began in earnest to think of means for preserving their religion and liberties from being utterly destroyed; and several of the nobility and gentry going abroad, waited on the prince of Orange at the Hague. The prince being invited over, as soon as the king knew it, he appeared in the utmost consternation, abolished the commission for ecclesiastical affairs, took off the bishop of London's suspension, restored the city their charter: but all this came too late; it was evidently the result of necessity, not inclination. When the king heard of the prince's landing, he ordered his army, under the earl of Feversham, to rendezvous on Salisbury plain; but, finding he could not rely on his army, returned to London, and on Dec. 10, at night, left Whitehall in disguise, in order to go to France. At his departure he sent a letter to the earl of Feversham to disband his forces. The king, having embarked on board a small vessel near Feversham, before he could sail, was stopped by a number of fishermen and others, who rifled him, and treated him with great indignity, taking him for a popish priest, and chaplain to Sir Edward Hales, who attended him in his flight. A constable coming on board, knew him, and behaved in a very respectful manner. The king finding he was known, was desirous to be gone; but the people brought him, as it were by force, to an inn in the town, where he sent for the earl of Winchelsea, who prevailed with him, much against his inclination, to go back to London, where, on Dec. 16, he arrived at Whitehall. The prince of Orange having issued out a declaration for a free parliament, the king, who was at Rochester, dreading the consequences of it, withdrew himself privately about three in the morning, with only the duke of Berwick his natural son, and two others: he embarked, and with a favourable wind arrived at Ambleteux, in France; from whence he immediately repaired to St. Germain's, where, after having lost the battle of the Boyne, in Ireland, he passed his days till his death, which happened in 1701. James II. was a prince in whom some good qualities were rendered ineffectual by mistaken notions of the prerogative, excessive bigotry to the religion of Rome, and an inflexible severity of temper. He was brave, steady, resolute, diligent, upright, and sincere, except when warped by religious considerations; yet, even where religion was not concerned, he appears to have been proud, haughty, vindictive, cruel, and unrelenting; and though he approved himself an obedient and dutiful subject, he certainly became one of the most intolerable sovereigns that ever reigned over a free people.

To JA'NGLE, v. n. [jangler, Fr. according to Skinner] to quarrel, or bicker in words; to make an untuneable sound.

JA'NGLER, s. a quarrelsome, noisy, prattling fellow.

JA'NIZARY, s. [Turk.] an order of foot soldiers in the Turkish armies, reputed the foot guards of the grand seignior.

JA'NNOCK, s. (probably a corruption of bannock) oat bread. A northern word.

JA'NTY, or JAUNTY, a. [corrupted from gentil, Fr.] showy; or carelessly adorned.

JA'NUARY, s. [Januarius, Lat.] the first month of the year, so named from Janus, to whom it was dedicated by the ancient Romans.

JAPA'N, a large country in the most eastern part of Asia, with the title of an empire. It is composed of several islands, between the E. coast of Asia, and the W. coast of America, extended from 130 to 140 lon. E. and from 30 to 41 lat. N. the principal of which are Nippon and Saikokf, or Sacok. It was discovered by some Portuguese in 1542 being cast upon shore by a tempest. The whole empire is divided into seven principal countries, which are subdivided into 70 provinces. It is the richest country in the world for gold, and the air and water are very good. It produces a great deal of rice, which they reap in September; millet, wheat, and barley, which they get in May. Cedars are common, and so large that they are proper for the masts of ships and columns for temples. They have a large quantity of porcelain, silk, and skins; as also red pearls, which are not less in esteem than the white. In short, Japan is accounted one of the best countries in Asia. The inhabitants are naturally ingenious, and have a happy memory; but their manners are diametrically opposite to those of the Europeans. Our common drinks are cold, and theirs are all hot; we uncover the head out of respect, and they the feet; we are fond of white teeth, and they of black; we get on horseback on the left side, and they on the right; and they have a language so particular, that it is understood by no other nation. They value their lives so little, that when a lord makes a feast, the domestics dispute who shall have the honour of cutting open their bellies before the guests. The sciences are highly esteemed among them, and they have several schools at different places. Those they study most are, arithmetic, rhetoric, poetry, history, and astronomy. Some of their schools at Meaco have each 3 or 4000 scholars. They treat the women with a great deal of severity, and punish adultery with death; yet a man may take as many wives as he pleases. On the other hand, brothel-houses are very frequent, and they tolerate sins against nature. Those that have too many children make no scruple of destroying some of them. The Japanese are naturally good soldiers, and skilful at shooting with a bow; however, as they inhabit nothing but islands, they are seldom at war with their neighbours. They formerly carried on a trade with the neighbouring countries; but now all communication with others is forbidden, especially with Christians, for they do not look on the Dutch to be such. The only Europeans that trade with Japan are the Dutch; and whenever their ships arrive, they take away their guns, sails, and helms, and carry them on shore till they are ready to return back. In the absence of the ships, the factors are shut up in a small peninsula, and are not suffered so much as to have a lighted candle in their houses in the night time. The merchandises which the Dutch carry to Japan are spices, sugars, silks, linen and woollen cloth, elephants' teeth, and haberdashery wares; for which they receive gold, silver, cabinets, and other japanned and lackered ware. The Japanese have neither tables, beds, nor chairs; but they sit and lie on carpets and mats in the manner of the Turks.

JAPA'N, s. [from Japan in Asia, where this kind of work was originally done] wood varnished and raised in figures, painted in gold and other colours. Figuratively, china, or fine japanned porcelain.

To JAPA'N, v. a. to varnish, or embellish with figures glazed with varnish.

JAPA'NNER, s. one skilled in varnishing.

To JAR, v. n. [from corre, anger, Sax.] to strike together with a kind of short rattling; to make a disagreeable harsh tone. Figuratively, to clash, interfere, act in opposition, or be inconsistent; to quarrel or dispute.

JAR, s. a disagreeable, harsh, untuneable sound. Figuratively, a quarrel, or state of discord. A door left a-jar, is a door left half open. Also, an earthen vessel.

JARDES, s. [Fr.] hard callous tumors in horses, a little below the bending of the ham on the outside. This distemper in time will make the horse halt, and grow so painful as to cause him to pine away, and become light-bellied. It is most common to managed horses, that have been kept too much upon their haunches.

JAR'GON, s. [jargon, Fr.] inarticulate and unintelligible talk; the use of words without ideas.

JARGONE'LL, s. a species of pear.

JAS'MINE, s. [jasmin, Fr.] it is commonly pronounced jessamine a tree with narrow spear-shaped leaves, bearing a white sweet-scented flower.

JAS'PER, s. [iaspis, Lat.] a hard stone of a bright beautiful green colour, sometimes clouded with white, found in many parts of the East Indies, &c. in masses of various sizes and shapes.

IATROLEPTIC, a. [iatroleptique, Fr. from ιατρος and λεπτο, Gr.] that cures by anointing.

JAVA, an island in the Eastern Indian Ocean, generally known by the name of Great Java, to distinguish it from Bali, by some named the Lesser Java; and is upwards of 600 miles in length, and from 60 to 80 in breadth. The N. coast has a great many commodious creeks, bays, harbours, and towns, with many little islands near the shore. In former times it had as many petty kings as there were large towns; but now it has two kingdoms only; one of which is under the jurisdiction of the king of Mataram, and the other under the king of Bantam. The inhabitants are of a brown complexion, have faces rather flat, short coal-black hair, large eye-brows, and large cheeks, with small eyes. The men are very robust and strong-limbed; but the women are small. The men wear a piece of calico wrapt two or three times round their middle; and the women wear them from their arm-pits down to their knees; but all other parts are bare. Those living near the sea-side are generally Mahometans; but within land they are Gentoos, abstaining from flesh of all kinds. It is a fertile island, producing sugar, and the various tropical fruits; and it has very high mountains. It has likewise impassable forests and wildernesses; but the N. between Batavia and Bantam is a very populous country, full of rice-fields, and various sorts of wild and tame animals. Here also is plenty of salt, pepper, cassia, wood used for building, gum benzoin, &c. besides flowering trees and shrubs, and most sorts of fruits proper to the climate. They have also hogs, beeves, and sheep, with other tame creatures; and likewise fowl, both wild and tame, in great abundance, among which are beautiful parroquets, peacocks of an extraordinary size, Bantam fowls, &c. In the woods are large tigers, rhinoceroses, and several other animals unknown in Europe; and in the rivers are crocodiles. The air is as temperate and healthy as any part of the East Indies. The rains, which begin in November, lay the low grounds under water, kill the insects, and continue till the return of May. The coasts of the island are mostly under the dominion of the Dutch. Besides the native Javanese, here are Chinese, Malaysians, Amboynese, Topasses, Bugasses, Timoreans, and many other people, brought from distant countries by the Dutch. This island was taken possession of by the British under Sir S. Auchmuty in Aug. 1811. Java lies to the S. E. of the island of Sumatra, from which it is only separated by the Straits of Sunda. Lat. 5. 45. to 7. 50. S. lon. 104. 20. to 114. 15. E. Batavia is the capital.

To JA'VEL, or JA'BLE, v. a. to bemire; to soil over with dirt through unnecessary travelling and traversing. This word is still used in the north of England.

JA'VEL, s. a wandering or dirty fellow.

JA'VELIN, s. [javeline, Fr.] a spear or half-pike, with an iron-pointed head; formerly used either by foot or horse.

JAU'NDICE, s. [jaunisse, Fr.] a distemper from obstructions of the glands of the liver, which prevents the gall being duly separated by them from the blood; and sometimes, especially in hard drinkers, they are so indurated as never after to be opened, and straiten the motion of the blood so much through that viscus, as to make it divert with a force great enough into the gastric arteries, which go off from the hepatic, to break through them, and drain into the stomach; so that vomiting of blood, in this distemper, is a fatal symptom.

JAU'NDICED, a. affected with the jaundice.

To JAUNT, v. n. [janter, Fr.] to wander about.

JAUNT, s. a ramble, flight, or excursion.

JAUNTINESS, s. airiness; a loose and careless air; gentleness. See JANTY.

JAW, s. the bone in the mouth in which the teeth are fixed. Figuratively, the mouth; a term of contempt.

JAY, s. [so named from his cry, according to Skinner] a bird about the size of a pigeon, with blue feathers on its wings, and of a kind of light brown or clay colour on its breast.

JA'ZEL, s. a precious stone of an azure or blue colour.

IBERIA, the ancient name of Spain, as well as of Georgia in Asia.

I'BIS, s. a bird very useful to the Egyptians for destroying serpents, locusts, and caterpillars; and, on that account, had divine honours paid to it.

ICE, s. [is, Sax. eyse, Belg.] water or other liquor frozen hard by cold; sugar melted and grown hard afterwards. To break the ice, is to make the first opening to any attempt.

To ICE, v. a. to freeze water hard; to cover with ice or concremented sugar.

ICEHOUSE, s. a house in which ice is preserved for use in the hot season.

ICELAND, a large island in the N. of Europe, about 600 miles in length, and 300 in breadth. For two months together the sun never sets; and in winter it never rises for the same space, at least not entirely. The middle of the island is mountainous, stony, and barren; but in some places there are excellent pastures, and the grass has a fine smell. The ice, which gets loose from the more northern country in May, brings with it a large quantity of wood, and several animals, such as foxes, wolves, and bears. Mount Hecla is the most noted mountain, and is a volcano, which sometimes throws out sulphureous torrents. Their houses are scattered about at a distance from each other, and many of them are deep in the ground; but they are mostly miserable huts, covered with skins. Many of the natives profess Christianity; but those that live at a distance are Pagans. Some of them are clothed with skins of beasts. The exports are dried fish, salted mutton, beef, butter, train oil, tallow, coarse and fine jackets of Wadmal, woollen stockings and gloves, red wool, sheep skins, sea-horses' teeth, fox tails of several colours, feathers, and quills. The imports are iron, horses' shoes, timber, meal, wine, brandy, tobacco, coarse linen, and domestic utensils. The number of inhabitants is about 50,000. Their language is the old Runic, or Gothic, the vernacular tongue of the Swedes, Danes, and Norwegians, before it branched into the several dialects since spoken by the natives of these three kingdoms. Lat. 63. 15. to 67. 15. N. lon. 16. to 25. W.

ICH DI'EN, ik deen, s. [I serve, from the Teut. or Sax.] the motto of the prince of Wales, formerly that of John king of Bohemia, on his shield, to denote that he was subservient to Philip king of France, whose pay he received; but being slain by Edward the Black Prince, the son of Edward III. he then assumed the motto, to denote his obedience to his father; since which it has always been borne by the Prince of Wales.

ICHNEU'MON, ik-neu-mon, s. [ἰχνεύμων, Gr.] a small animal remarkable for its antipathy to the crocodile, whose eggs it breaks. The ichneumon fly is a fly which is bred in the body of caterpillars, and is so called in allusion to the report that the ichneumon gets down the throat of the crocodile, and eats its way out through the crocodile's belly.

ICHNO'GRAPHY, ik-no-gra-fy, s. from ἵχνος and γράφω, Gr.] in Perspective, the view of any thing cut off by a plain parallel to the horizon, just at the bottom of it.

I'CHOR, i-kor, s. [ἰχώρ, Gr.] signifies a thin watery humour like serum; but is sometimes also used for a thicker kind, flowing from ulcers, called also sanies.

I'CHOROUS, s. [from ἰχώρ, Gr.] sanious; thin; undigested.

ICHTHYO'LOGY, ik-thy-o-lo-gy, s. [from ἰχθυολογία, Gr.] the science of fishes, or that branch of zoology which treats of fishes.

ICHTHYO'PHAGY, s. [from ἰχθὺς and φάγω, Gr.] diet of fish; the practice of eating fish.

I'CICLE, s. [from ice] a shoot or thread of ice, hanging down from any high place.

ICINESS, s. the state of water grown hard by cold.

I'CKWORTH, a town of Suffolk, with a market on Friday. It is a small place, and there are the ruins of an ancient priory, and several Roman coins have been dug up. It is 79 miles N. N. E. of London. More properly Ixworth.

I'CON, s. [εἰκὼν, Gr.] a picture, resemblance, portrait, or representation; an image.

ICO'NOCLAST, s. [εἰκὼν and κλάτης, Gr.] a breaker of images.

ICONO'LOGY, s. [iconologie, Fr. εἰκὼν and λόγος, Gr.] the science that describes the figures and representations of men and heathen deities with their proper attributes and appendages, as Saturn like an old man with a scythe; Jupiter with a thunderbolt in his hand, and an eagle by his side, &c.

ICTERICAL, a. [icterique, Fr. from icterus, Lat.] affected with the jaundice. Good against the jaundice, applied to medicines.

I'CY, a. full of, or covered with ice. Figuratively, cold, applied to the touch. Frosty, applied to the weather. Not warm. Free from passion, applied to the mind.

I'D, contracted for I would.

IDE'A, s. [ἰδέα, Gr.] whatsoever the mind perceives in itself, or is the immediate object of perception, thought, or understanding; the form under which any thing appears to the mind, or the object on which the mind is employed when thinking; a notion. SYNON. Idea represents the object; thought considers it; imagination forms it; thus worked up, it becomes a notion. The first only points; the second examines; the third seduces; but the last draws.

IDE'AL, a. mental, intellectual; existing in the mind.

IDE'ALLY, ad. mentally; in the mind.

IDENTIC, or IDENTICAL, a. [identique, Fr.] the same; implying the same thing, or the same idea.

To IDENTIFY, v. a. to make two things the same.

IDENTITY, s. [identité, Fr.] sameness; that by which a thing is itself, or by which it is distinguished from any other.

IDES, s. [ides, Fr. idus, Lat.] a term anciently used to distinguish time; it fell on the 13th of every month, excepting in March, May, July, and October, in which it is the 15th, because in those months it was six days before the nones, but in others only four.

IDIO'CRASY, s. [ἰδιος and κράσις, Gr.] peculiarity of constitution.

IDIOCRATICAL, a. peculiar to constitution.

I'DIOCY, s. [ἰδιωτεία, Gr.] a defect of understanding. Both idiocy and lunacy excuse from the guilt of crimes.

I'DIOM, s. [idiome, Fr. ἰδίωμα, Gr.] a manner of speaking, or phrase, peculiar to any particular language or dialect; phraseology.

JE'ALOUS, a. [jalous, Fr.] suspicious of not being equally beloved by one whom one loves; suspicious of the sincerity of a married person's affections; fond; emulous; or prosecuting with a kind of rivalry; full of suspicion.

JE'ALOUSLY, ad. in such a manner as to betray suspicion of the sincerity of a lover or married person; extremely cautious, vigilant, or zealous.

JE'ALOUSNESS, s. the state of being jealous; rivalry; suspicious vigilance.

JE'ALOUSY, s. [jalousie, Fr.] a state of mind wherein a lover imagines himself not equally beloved, or a married person who suspects the husband or wife not faithful to the marriage bed; a suspicious fear.

JE'DBURGH, a town of Roxburghshire, situated almost in the centre of the county, on the banks of the Jed, and near its confluence with the Teviot, 34 miles S. E. of Edinburgh. It contains 4454 inhabitants, (including the environs, which belong to the parish,) and is the seat of the law courts for the county.

JE'DDO, or Yeddo, the second capital of Japan, in the island of Nippon, where the dairo, or nominal emperor, resides. The houses are built with earth, and boarded on the outside to prevent the rain from destroying the walls. In every street is an iron gate, which is shut up in the night, and a kind of custom-house or magazine, to put merchandise in. It is 9 miles in length and 6 in breadth, and contains 1,000,000 inhabitants. A fire happened in 1658, which, in the space of 48 hours, burnt down 100,000 houses, and in which a great number of the inhabitants perished. The emperor's palace was reduced to ashes; but the whole is rebuilt. The royal palace is in the middle of the town, and is defended by walls, ditches, towers, and bastions. Where the emperor resides, are three towers, nine stories high, each covered with plates of gold; and the hall of audience is supported by pillars of massy gold. Near the palace are several others, where the relations of the emperor live. The empress has a palace of her own, and there are 20 small ones for the concubines. Besides, all the vassal kings have each a palace in the city, with a handsome garden, and stables for 2000 horses. The generality of the houses are nothing but a ground floor, and rooms are parted by folding screens; so that they can make the rooms larger or smaller at pleasure. Jeddo is well fortified, and is seated in a plain at the bottom of an extensive gulf or bay; and the river which crosses it is divided into several canals. Lat. 35. 46. N. lon. 139. 30. E.

To JEER, v. n. [etymology uncertain] to scoff; to mock. Actively, to rally; to treat with ridicule.

JE'OPARDY, s. hazard, or a state wherein a person is exposed to extreme danger.

JE'RICHO, an ancient town of Palestine, celebrated formerly for the great number of palm-trees growing near it, and therefore called the City of Palm-trees. At present, it is only a square tower, surrounded with huts or tents of the Arabians, and called by them Herubi. Many palm-trees are yet growing here. It is 5 miles W. of the river Jordan, and 20 E. by N. of Jerusalem.

To JERK, v. a. [geraccan, Sax.] to strike with a quick and violent blow.

JERKIN, s. [cyrtelkin, Sax.] a jacket, short coat, or close waistcoat.

JERSEY, an island in the English Channel, 12 miles from the coast of Normandy in France, and 25 from the coast of Britany, subject to the English. It is about 30 miles in circumference, and difficult of access, on account of the rocks, sands, and forts, erected for its defence. It contains 12 parishes; and the chief town is St. Helier, in the S. part of the island. It lies extremely well for trade in time of peace, and to annoy the French privateers in time of war. It is well watered with rivulets, and is pretty well stocked with fruit-trees. They have a noted manufactory for woollen stockings and caps, and are still governed by the ancient Norman laws, the courts of England having no jurisdiction here. In 1781, a body of French troops landed on this island, surprised the lieutenant governor, and compelled him to sign a capitulation; but major Pierson, the commander of the English troops, refused to abide by this forced capitulation, and attacked the French in the town of St. Helier. The French were compelled to surrender prisoners of war; but the gallant major was killed in the moment of victory.

JERSEY, NEW, one of the United States of North America; bounded on the W. by Pennsylvania, on the S. by Maryland, on the N. by New York, and on the E. by the ocean, and is about 140 miles in length from N. to S. and 60 in breadth from E. to W. The chief towns are Burlington, Perth-Amboy, and Elizabeth-town. It is divided into E. and W. Jersey; and the produce of both is Indian corn, wheat, pease, beans, barley, oats, and horses, black cattle, furs, and pipe-staves. They send to the Caribbee islands, bread, corn, salt, beef, pork, and fish; and, in return, receive the other produce of those islands. To England they send furs and skins; for which they have furniture and cloths in return. The population of New Jersey, in 1820, amounted to 277,575 souls.

JERSEY, s. [from the island of Jersey, which is famous for spinning of yarn; a fine woollen yarn.

JERUSALEM, anciently Salem and Jebus; among the Greeks and Latins, it was known by the name of Solyma and Hierosolyma, the capital of Judea or Palestine in Asia. It was a very famous city while the Jews inhabited that country; and in its most flourishing state it consisted of four parts, each being inclosed within its own walls. 1. The old city, which stood on Mount Zion, where king David built a palace. 2. The lower city, styled also the daughter of Zion, as being built after it; where king Solomon's palace stood, also Herod's theatre and amphitheatre, the latter capable of containing 80,000 persons. 3. The new city, mostly inhabited by tradesmen and numbers of merchants. And, 4. Mount Moriah, where Solomon's magnificent temple stood. But all this glory has long since been laid in the dust, in exact conformity to our Saviour's prophecy, particularly with regard to the latter, "that one stone of it should not be left upon another." It is now inhabited by Turks, Arabs, Jews, and Christians. It stands on a high rock, with steep ascents upon every side, except to the N. It is almost surrounded with valleys encompassed with mountains, so that it seems to stand in the middle of an amphitheatre. It is about three miles in circumference, and includes Mount Calvary, which was formerly without the walls. On this hill is erected a large structure, with a round nave, which has no light but what comes through the top, called the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; the chapel of which is cut out of the rock, and lamps are kept constantly burning in it. The Christian pilgrims flock here from various parts, and the inhabitants accommodate them with lodgings and provisions, which is their chief business; and a bashaw, with a guard of janizaries, always resides here, to protect them from the insults of the Arabs. The above superb structure, built by the empress Helena 1400 years ago, was destroyed by fire on the 11th of Oct. 1808. Jerusalem is 112 miles S. S. W. of Damascus, and 45 from the Mediterranean Sea. Lat. 31. 55. N. lon. 35. 25. E.

JESS, s. [gecte, Fr. getto, Ital.] short straps of leather tied about the legs of a hawk, with which she is held on the fist.

To JEST, v. n. [gesticulator, Lat.] to make a person merry by pleasant and witty turns in expression, and odd or comical motions of the body; to speak a thing one knows to be false, purely to divert another.

JEST, s. any thing meant only to divert a person, or raise laughter; a witty or pointed turn of words, which diverts or raises laughter; game, not earnest.

JESTER, s. one given to witty turns in expression, to sarcasms, to odd and comical pranks; a buffoon, or one formerly kept by great persons to divert them by his witty turns or odd pranks.

JESUITS, or The Society of JESUS, a famous religious order in the Romish church, founded by Ignatius Loyola, a native of Guipuscoa, in Spain, who, in the year 1538, assembled ten of his companions at Rome, principally chosen out of the university of Paris, and made a proposal to them to form a new order; when, after many deliberations, it was agreed to add to the three ordinary vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, a fourth, which was, to go into all countries whither the pope should please to send them, in order to make converts to the Romish church. Two years after, Pope Paul III. gave them a bull, by which he approved this new order, giving them a power to make such statutes as they should judge convenient; on which Ignatius was created general of the order, which in a short time spread over all the countries of the world, to which he sent his companions, while he staid at Rome, from whence he governed the whole society. This society had rendered themselves so obnoxious, during the last two centuries, by their arts and intrigues, that they were suppressed in all the kingdoms of Europe: in England, in 1604; Venice, in 1606; Portugal, in 1759; France, in 1764; Spain and Sicily, in 1767; and totally suppressed and abolished by Pope Clement XIV. in 1773.—This order was, however, revived in August, 1814, by Pope Pius VII.

JETTY, a. made of, as black as, jet.

JEWEL, s. [jeweelen, Belg.] in its primary sense, any ornament of great value, generally applied to such as were set with precious stones; a gem or precious stone. Figuratively, applied to persons, to convey an idea of great esteem and affection towards them. Jewel Office, an office belonging to the Crown, has the charge of weighing and fashioning the king's plate, and delivering it out by warrant from the lord chamberlain.

JEWELLER, s. one who deals in precious stones.

JEW, s. a name derived from the patriarch Judah, and given to the descendants of Abraham by his eldest son Isaac, who for a long time possessed the land of Palestine in Asia, and are now dispersed through all the nations in the world. They are tolerated in most countries, and the French Republic allowed them the rights of citizens.

JEW-EARS, s. a fungus, tough and thin; and naturally, while growing, of a rumpled figure, like a flat and variously hollowed cup. It generally grows on the lower parts of the trunks of elder-trees which are in a decaying state. The common people cure themselves of sore throats with a decoction of it in milk.

JEW-STONE, s. a fossil, being the spine of a very large urchin petrified by lying long in the earth; it receives its name from its being found in Syria, which was famous for the residence of Jews.

JEW-HARP, s. [of joue, Fr. a cheek, and harp, from its being held against the cheek] a kind of musical instrument used by the vulgar, made of steel, held against the teeth, and sounded by the motion of a spring, which when struck by the finger, vibrates against the breath.

IF, conj. [gif, Sax.] granting or allowing a thing; upon condition, or supposition. Followed by another sentence that includes opposition, it implies whether or no; provided; or upon condition.

INDIA, an extensive region in Asia, which lies between 66 and 93 degrees E. lon. and 7 and 33 degrees N. lat. Under this name is generally understood all the countries which lie S. of Tartary, and extend from the eastern frontiers of Persia to the western coasts of China, divided into India within, and India without, the Ganges. The moderns have likewise included, under the denomination of the East Indies, the islands of Japan, with all the islands in the Eastern and Indian Oceans, nearly as far as New Holland and New Guinea. But the name of India is most frequently applied to that country only, which is distinguished in Asia, as well as in Europe, by the name of Hindoostan; and which may be more strictly considered under the three grand divisions of Hindoostan Proper, the Deccan, and the Peninsula. Hindoostan Proper includes all the countries that lie to the N. of the river Nerbudda, and of the soubahs of Bahar and Bengal. The principal soubahs, or provinces, in Hindoostan Proper, are Agimere, Agra, Cashmere, Delhi, Guzerat, Lahore, Malwa, Moulton, Oude, Rohilcund, Sindy, &c. The term Deccan, which signifies the South, has been extended to the whole region that lies to the S. of Hindoostan Proper, but in its most proper and limited sense, it means only the countries situated between Hindoostan Proper, the Carnatic, the Western Indian Sea, and Orissa; namely, the provinces of Candeish, Dowlatabad, Visiapour, Golcondo, and the western part of Behrar. All the tract S. of the Kistna, is generally called the Peninsula. The name India, by which this country, as far as it was known, is distinguished in the earliest Greek histories, appears to be derived from Hind, the name given to it by the ancient Persians, through whom the knowledge of the country was transmitted to the Greeks. The word Hindoostan is, indeed, entirely of Persian origin, compounded of Stan, a region, and Hind, or Hindoo. The whole of Hindoostan may now be said to consist of five principal states, which hold as tributaries, or feudatories, some numerous inferior states. These five principal states are, the British; the Poonah Mahrattas; the Behrar Mahrattas; Nizam Ally, soubah of the Deccan; and the Seiks. The British possessions are Mysore, or the dominions of the late Tippoo Sultan, Bengal, the greater part of Bahar, part of Allahabad, part of Orissa, the Northern Circars, a jaghire in the Carnatic, Baramahal, Dindigul, and some considerable countries to the N. and S. of Calicut, on the coast of Malabar, with Bombay, and the Island of Salsette. The allies of the British, who may be considered as dependent on them, are the nabob of Oude; the nabob of the Carnatic, including Tanjore, Madura, Tinevelly, and Marrawars; the rajahs of Travancore; and the territory of Cochin. The Indian territory held by England, either in direct subjection, or through the intervention of dependent allies, contains more than 20,000,000 inhabitants, and yields an annual revenue of 8,000,000. sterling. Exclusive of the Europeans, the inhabitants of Hindoostan are computed at 10,000,000 Mahometans, and 100,000,000 Hindoos. The Mahometans, or Mussulmans, are represented as bearing a very bad character. The Hindoos, or Gentoos, are of a black complexion, their hair long, their persons straight, their limbs neat, their fingers long and tapering, and their countenances open and pleasant. They are divided into different tribes or casts. The four principal tribes are the brahmins, soldiers, labourers, and mechanics; and these are subdivided into a multiplicity of inferior distinctions. There are bramins of various degrees, who have the care of religion, or of the administration of the Gentoo law, allotted to them. These priests are held sacred by the Indians or Hindoos. Those who engage in worldly pursuits are generally the worst of all the Gentoos; for, persuaded that the waters of the Ganges will purify them from their sins, and exempted from the utmost rigour of the courts of justice, (under the Gentoo governments,) they run into the greatest excesses. The soldiers are commonly called Rajah-poots: that is, descendants of the rajahs. They readily enter into the service of any that will pay them, and follow wherever he leads. The English have many battalions of them in their employ, under the name of Sepoys. The labourers include farmers, and all who cultivate the land. The mechanics include merchants, bankers, and all who follow any trade; these again are subdivided into each particular branch. Besides these, there are the Parians, or Hallachores, who cannot be called a tribe, being rather the refuse or outcasts of the other tribes. They are a set of poor unhappy people, who are destined to perform the most disagreeable offices of life, bury the dead, and carry away every thing that is polluted. One description of these, or rather the outcasts of these outcasts, the Poulichees, on the Malabar coast, are held in such abomination, that if one of them happens to touch a Hindoo of a superior tribe, the latter does not scruple to draw his sabre, and kill him on the spot; and for so atrocious an act he is not even called to an account. All the different tribes are kept distinct from each other, by insurmountable barriers; they are forbidden to intermarry, to dwell together, to eat with each other, or even to drink out of the same vessel; and, if they transgress any of these rules, they are obliged from that instant to join with the Hallachores. The dominion of religion extends here to a thousand particulars, which in other countries are governed by the civil laws, or by taste, custom, or fashion. Their dress, their food, the common intercourses of life, their marriages, and professions, are all under the jurisdiction of religion. The food of the Hindoos is simple, consisting chiefly of rice, ghee, (a kind of imperfect butter,) milk, vegetables, and oriental spices. The warrior cast may eat of the flesh of goats, sheep, and poultry; and other superior casts may eat poultry and fish. Their happiness consists in the solaces of domestic life; and they are taught by their religion, that matrimony is an indispensable duty in every man, who does not entirely separate himself from the world from a principle of devotion. Their religion permits them to have several wives; but they seldom have more than one; and their wives are distinguished by a decency of demeanour, a solicitude in their families, and a fidelity to their vows, which might do honour to human nature in the most civilized countries. The custom of women burning themselves on the death of their husbands, is still practised in Hindoostan. It is asserted, that they dig a pit, in which is deposited a large quantity of combustible matter, which is set on fire; and the body being let down, the victim throws herself into the flaming mass. In other places, a pile is raised extremely high, and the body and the wife is placed upon it, and then the whole is set on fire. In the Code of Gentoo Laws, translated by N. B. Halhead, esq. is the following remarkable passage concerning this practice: "It is proper for a woman, after her husband's death, to burn herself in the fire with his corpse. Every woman, who thus burns herself, shall remain in paradise with her husband three crore and fifty lacks of years, by destiny. If she cannot burn, she must, in that case, preserve an inviolable chastity: if she remain always chaste, she goes to paradise; and if she do not preserve her chastity, she goes to hell." Hindoostan, towards the N. is pretty temperate; but hot towards the S. and it rains almost continually for three months in the year. Its products are rice, millet, cotton, figs, pomegranates, oranges, lemons, citrons, cocoa trees, &c. There are mines of gold, silver, and diamonds. Besides domestic animals, here are elephants, rhinoceroses, buffaloes, lions, tigers, leopards, panthers, and monkeys, with camels and dromedaries. Its principal exports are sugar, indigo, saltpetre, silk, cotton, and precious stones; and particularly calicoes, chintzes, muslins, &c.

INDIAN, a. [from India] belonging to India. Used substantively for a person born in the Indies.

INDIAN ARROW-ROOT, s. a sovereign remedy for the bite of wasps and the poison of the manchineel tree. The Indians apply this root to extract the venom of their arrows.

INDIAN RED, s. a species of ochre; a very fine purple earth, of firm compact texture, and great weight.

INDIANS of North and South America, the original natives of these two vast continents. Of the manners of the North American Indians, the reader may have a general idea, by an account of those who inhabit the countries to the E. of the river Mississippi. These consist of 28 different nations; the principal of which are the Cherokees, the Chicasaws, the Choctaws, the Creeks, the Delawares, the Six Nations, the Shawanese, the Hurons, the Illinois, &c. Allowing about 700 to a nation or tribe, they will contain in all 20,000 people. The Indians are not born white; and take a great deal of pains to darken their complexion, by anointing themselves with grease, and lying in the sun. They also paint their face, breast, and shoulders, of various colours, but generally red; and their features are neat, especially those of the women. They are of a middle stature, their limbs clean and straight, and scarcely any crooked or deformed persons to be found among them. In many parts of their bodies they tattoo themselves, or prick in gunpowder on the skin in very pretty figures. Some shave, or pluck the hair off their heads, except a patch about the crown, which is ornamented with beautiful feathers, beads, wampum, and such like baubles; and except the head and eyebrows, they pluck the hair with great diligence from all parts of the body. Their ears are pared and stretched in a thong down to their shoulders. They are wound round with wire to expand them, and adorned with silver pendants, rings, and bells, which they likewise wear in their noses. Some of them will have a large feather through the cartilage of the nose; and those who can afford it wear a collar of wampum, a silver breastplate, and bracelets on the arms and wrists. A bit of cloth about the middle, a shirt of the English make, on which they bestow innumerable broaches to adorn it, a sort of cloth boot and mockasoons which are shoes of a make peculiar to the Indians, ornamented with porcupine quills, with a blanket or watch-coat thrown over all, complete their dress at home; but when they go on expeditions, they leave their trinkets behind, and mere necessities serve them. There is little difference between the dress of the men and women, excepting that a short petticoat, and the hair, which is exceeding black and long, clubbed behind, distinguish some of the latter. They are such expert marksmen, that they will kill birds flying, fishes swimming, and wild beasts running. They are very intelligent people, quick of apprehension, sudden in execution, subtle in business, exquisite in invention, and industrious in action. They are very hardy, bearing heat, cold, hunger, and thirst, in a surprising manner, and yet no people are more addicted to excess in eating and drinking, when it is conveniently in the power. Their public conferences shew them to be men of genius; and they have, in a high degree, the talents of natural or unstudied eloquence. They live dispersed in small villages, either in the woods or on the banks of rivers, where they have little plantations of Indian corn and roots, not enough to supply their families half the year; and subsist the remainder of it by hunting, fishing, and fowling, and the fruits of the earth, which grow spontaneously in great plenty. Their huts are generally built of small logs and covered with bark, each one having a chimney, and a door, on which they place a padlock. They mostly lie upon skins of wild beasts, and sit on the ground. They have brass kettles and pots to boil their food. Gourds or calabashes, cut asunder, serve them for pails, cups, and dishes. The accounts of travellers concerning their religion are various. All agree that they acknowledge one supreme God. They adore the Great Spirit, and believe that his care is extended over them; and that 'he puts good into their hearts.' They also believe in a future state; that after death they shall be removed to their friends, who have gone before them, to an elysium, or paradise. Some believe that there is great virtue in feasts for the sick. For this purpose, a young buck must be killed and boiled, the friends and near neighbours of the patient invited, and having first thrown tobacco on the fire, and covered it up close, they all sit down in a ring, and raise a lamentable cry. They then uncover the fire, and kindle it up; and the head of the buck is first sent about, every one taking a bit, and giving a loud croak, in imitation of crows. They afterward proceed to eat all the buck, making a most harmonious, melancholy song; in which strain their music is particularly excellent. Some nations abhor adultery, do not approve of a plurality of wives, and are not guilty of theft; but there are other tribes that are not so scrupulous. Among the Chicasaws, a husband may cut off the nose of his wife if guilty of adultery; but men are allowed greater liberty. This nation despises a thief. Among the Cherokees they cut off the nose and ears of an adulteress; afterward her husband gives her a discharge. Their form of marriage is short: the man, before witnesses, gives the bride a deer's foot, and she, in return, presents him with an ear of corn, as emblems of their several duties. The women are very slaves, in most instances, to the men; in others, they are said to be upon an equal footing, deliberating in the public assemblies. Sometimes their prisoners are destined to be tortured to death, in order to satiate the revenge of their conquerors. When the fatal sentence is intimated to them, they receive it with an unaltered countenance, raise their death-song, and prepare to suffer like men. The victors assemble as to a solemn festival, resolved to put the fortitude of the captives to the utmost proof. A scene ensues, the bare description of which is enough to chill the heart with horror. The prisoners are tied naked to a stake, but so as to be at liberty to move round it. All present, men, women, and children, fall upon them with knives and other instruments; and such is their cruel ingenuity in torturing, that by avoiding to touch the vital part, they often prolong the scene of anguish for several days. In spite of all their sufferings, the victims continue to chant their death-song with a firm voice; they boast of their own exploits, they insult their tormentors for their want of skill to avenge the death of their friends and relations, they warn them of the vengeance that awaits them on account of what they are now doing, and excite their ferocity by the most provoking reproaches and threats. Weary, at length, with contending with men, whose constancy they cannot vanquish, some chief puts a period to their sufferings, by dispatching them with his dagger or his club. The people of S. America gratify their revenge in a manner somewhat different, but with the same unrelenting rancour. Their prisoners, after meeting, at their first entrance, with the same rough reception as among the N. Americans, are not only exempt from injury, but treated with the greatest apparent kindness, feasted, and caressed. But, by a refinement of cruelty, while they seem studious to attach their captives to life, their doom is irrevocably fixed. On an appointed day, the victorious tribe assembles, the prisoner is brought forth with great solemnity, he meets his lot with undaunted firmness, and is dispatched with a single blow. The moment he falls the women seize the body, and dress it for the feast. They besmear their children with the blood, in order to kindle in their bosoms a hatred of their enemies, and all join in feeding upon the flesh with amazing greediness and exultation. The Indians of S. America, immediately under the Spanish government, although the most depressed order of men in the country which belonged to their ancestors, are now far from being treated with that rigour and cruelty which was laid to the charge of the first conquerors of that continent. They are no longer considered as slaves; on the contrary, they are reputed as freemen, and entitled to the privileges of subjects.

INDICANT, a. [indicans, Lat.] shewing, discovering, or pointing out. In Physic, pointing out a remedy.

To INDICATE, v. a. [indico, Lat.] to shew; to point out.

INDICATION, s. [indicatio, Lat.] a mark, token, sign, or symptom, of something which is hidden, or not plain of itself; a discovery or information of something that was not known. In Medicine, a symptom discovering or directing what is to be done to cure a distemper. It is of four kinds; vital, preservative, curative, and palliative; as it directs what is to be done to continue life, cutting off the cause of an approaching distemper, curing it while it is actually present, or lessening its effects, or taking off some of its symptoms, before it can be wholly removed.

INDICATIVE, a. [indicativus, Lat.] shewing, discovering, or pointing out. In Grammar, the first mood of a verb, wherein it expresses affirmation, denial, doubting, or declaring. The English indicative is formed in most of its tenses after the manner of the Saxons.

INDICATIVELY, ad. in such a manner as shews, declares, discovers, or betokens.

INDICO, s. a plant by the Americans called anil. In the middle of the flower is the style, which afterwards becomes a jointed pod, containing one cylindrical seed in one partition, from which indico is made, which is used in dying for a blue colour.

To INDICT, in-dite, v. a. to charge a person with a crime, by a written accusation, before a judge.

INDICTABLE, a. liable to be indicted.

INDICTION, s. [indiction, Fr.] a declaration or proclamation. In Chronology, the indiction, instituted by Constantine the Great, is properly a cycle of tributes, orderly disposed, for fifteen years, and by it accounts of that kind were kept. Afterwards, in memory of the great victory obtained by Constantine over Maxentius, 8 Cal. Oct. 312, by which an entire freedom was given to Christianity, the council of Nice, for the honour of Constantine, ordained that the accounts of years should be no longer kept by the Olympiads, which till that time had been done; but that, instead thereof, the indiction should be made use of, by which to reckon and date their years, which had its epocha A. D. 313, Jan. 1.

INDICTMENT, s. a bill, or an accusation for an offence, exhibited unto jurors; a bill, or declaration, made in form of law for the benefit of the commonwealth.

INDIES, WEST, the name given to a great number of islands in the Atlantic Ocean, which extend from the N. W. extremity of the Bahama Islands, off the coasts of Florida, in lat. 27. 45. N. in a south-easterly direction, to the island of Tobago, which is 120 miles from the coast of Terra Firma, in 11. deg. 30. min. N. lat. They lie between 59 and 36 deg. W. long. Cuba being the most western, and Barbadoes the most eastern of all these islands. When Christopher Columbus discovered them in 1492, he considered them as part of those vast regions in Asia, comprehended under the general name of India; to reach which, by a course due W. across the Atlantic Ocean, had been the grand object of his voyage: and this opinion was so general, that Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Castile, (in their ratification of their agreement granted to Columbus upon his return,) gave them also the name of Indies. Even after the error which gave rise to this opinion was detected, and the true position of the New World was ascertained, the name has remained, and the appellation of the West Indies is still given to these islands, and that of Indians to the inhabitants, not only of the islands, but of the two continents of America. They are likewise called the Caribbee Islands, from the aborigines of the country; and the sea in which they lie, is sometimes called by modern geographers, the Archipelago of the Caribbees. By the French they are called the Greater and Less Antilles; the Greater, comprehending Cuba, St. Domingo, Jamaica, and Porto Rico; and the Less, Aruba, Curaçoa, Bonair, Margaretta, and some others near the coast of Terra Firma. Foreign geographers, however, are not agreed as to the meaning or application of the word, some applying it to the Caribbee Islands in general. Nautical men distinguish them, from the different courses taken by ships, into the Leeward and Windward Islands. The name of the Caribbees should properly be confined to the smaller islands, which lie between Porto Rico and Tobago. These were inhabited by the Caribbees, a hardy race of men, nowise resembling their feeble and timid neighbours in the larger islands. Even in later times, they have made a stout resistance in defence of the last territory (the island of St. Vincent) which the rapacity of their invaders had left in their possession.

INDURATION, s. the state of growing hard; the act of making hard; hardness of heart.

INDUS, a great river of Hindoostan, called by the natives Sinde or Sindeh. It is formed of about ten principal streams, which descend from the Persian and Tartarian mountains; but, according to Major Rennel, the sources of these streams must be far more remote than the sides of these mountains. From the city of Attock, in about lat. 32. 27. N. downward to Moulton, to the conflux of the Janeub, or Chunaub, it is commonly called the river of Attock. Below the city of Moulton, it proceeds in a S. W. direction, through the province of that name, and that of Sinde, entering the Western Indian Ocean by several mouths, N. W. of the Gulf of Cutch. It is a fine, deep, and navigable river, for vessels of any burden; the different branches are also most of them navigable to a great extent; its mouth, however, is so choaked up with sand, that no ships can enter it.

INGRIA, a province of the Russian empire, which now forms the government of St. Petersburg. It is bounded on the N. by the river Neva and the gulf of Finland, on the E. and S. by the government of Novogorod and that of Pleskow, and on the W. by the gulf of Finland and the governments of Esthonia and Riga. It is about 130 miles long, and 50 broad. The Czar Peter the Great wrested it from the Swedes, and it was confirmed to him by the treaty of Ny-stadt, in 1721. At that time, the inhabitants of the flat country were a Finnish people, but little different from the Fins of Carelia, as to their language and manners. They were called Ischortzi from the river Ischora, which runs into the Neva. Ingria did not retain its ancient Swedish privileges; on the contrary, Peter made a present of one part of the Ischortzi to certain Russian nobles; who, on their side were obliged to people the less cultivated cantons of Ingria with colonies of Russians from their estates; and thence it was, that we often see a village of Russians surrounded by villages of Fins. Before the conquest of this country, the Ingrians had Lutheran preachers for every canton; but numbers of them have since conformed to the profession of the Greek faith. The country abounds with various wild animals, particularly rein-deer.

INVENTRESS, s. [inventrice, Fr.] a female who finds out or produces any thing new.

INVERA'RY, a town in Argyleshire, containing upwards of 1800 inhabitants. Here are manufactures of linen and woollen, as also considerable works for smelting iron by means of charcoal. One ship belonging to the town is engaged in foreign trade, and about half a dozen are employed in imports of meal, coals, merchants' goods, &c. exporting wool, timber, and oak bark. It is seated on the N. W. side of Loch Fyne, near which is a castle, the seat of the duke of Argyle, 75 miles N. W. of Edinburgh.

INVERNESS, a populous flourishing town of Scotland, capital of a county of the same name, pleasantly situated on the S. bank of the river Ness, and overlooking the Frith of Murray. It has a safe and convenient harbour, and a good trade. Several large buildings have been erected on the N. side of the town, in which a considerable manufactory of ropes and canvass is carried on. It is a royal burgh, holding its first charter from Malcolm Canmore. Over the river Ness is a handsome bridge of seven arches. The salmon fishery on this river is very considerable, and is let to some fishmongers of London. A little to the W. of this town is the remarkable vitrified fort, called Craig Phadrick; the stones composing its walls appear to have been partly melted by fire. Inverness is 50 miles N. E. of Fort William, and 145 N. N. W. of Edinburgh. Lat. 57. 30. N. lon. 4. 5. W. Inhabitants, 10,757.

INVERNESS, the most extensive county of Scotland, bounded on the W. by the ocean; on the N. by Ross-shire; on the E. by the counties of Nairne, Murray, Aberdeen, and Perth; and on the S. by those of Perth and Argyle. Its extent from N. to S. is about 45 miles; and from E. to W. 75. The northern part is very mountainous and barren. The woody mountains are the haunts of stags and roes. The capercailzie is also seen sometimes among the lofty pines; the heath is possessed by wild fowl; and the lofty summits by ptarmigans and Alpine hares. This county has several considerable lakes; being divided, in a manner, into two equal parts, by Loch Ness, Loch Oich, Loch Lochy, and Loch Eil; all which might be united by a canal, that would form a communication between the two seas. The great lakes in this county are seldom or never known to freeze; much less are the arms of the sea, even in the most northern parts of Scotland, subject to be frozen in the hardest seasons; while the Texel, and many bays and great rivers in Holland and Germany, are covered with ice. The southern part of the shire is also very mountainous, and is supposed to be the most elevated ground in Scotland. The extensive plains which surround the lakes are, in general, fertile; and the high grounds feed many sheep and black cattle, the rearing and selling of which is the chief trade of the inhabitants. Limestone, iron ore, and some traces of different minerals, have been found in this county, with beautiful rock crystals of various tints; but no mines have been worked hitherto with much success. The principal river is the Spey; but there are many others of inferior note, as the Ness, Fyers, Glass, Lochy, &c. The people in the high parts of the country, and on the western shore, speak Gaelic or Erse, but the people of fashion in Inverness, and its neighbourhood, use the English language, and pronounce it with propriety. Inhabitants, in 1811, males 35,749, females 42,666.

INVERSE, a. [inversus, Lat.] inverted; reciprocal; opposed to direct. It is so called in Proportion, when the fourth term is so much greater than the third, as the second is less than the first; or so much less than the third, as the second is greater than the first.

JOHN, succeeded Richard I. his brother, in the throne of England, April 6, 1199. He was in France when his brother died; where having been crowned duke of Normandy, he returned to England, May 25, and was crowned the 28th, being then 32 years of age. His marriage with Isabella of Anjou before, who had been betrothed to Hugh earl of March, ruined his affairs in France. His passion for her was so great, that, to make her his wife, he divorced Avisa of Gloucester, under pretence of consanguinity; and without scruple broke through the engagement between Isabella and the earl of March. King John had an interview with the king of Scotland at Lincoln, and received his homage. Whilst they were there, the body of Hugh bishop of Lincoln, reputed a saint, being brought from London to be interred, they both went out to meet it, and taking the coffin on their shoulders, bore it for some time. But notwithstanding this and other marks of respect shewn to the clergy, king John's nomination of a person to the vacant see of Lincoln was rejected with the utmost contempt by the canons of that church; which was owing to Innocent III. the then Pope, resolving by all methods to prevent princes from having any thing to do with the election of bishops and abbots. The king's ill conduct at home and abroad caused great discontent among his subjects. He usurped such an absolute power, as made them apprehensive that their liberties were in danger. This alarmed the nobility, and put them upon forming schemes to oppose his arbitrary proceedings. The Poitevins having revolted, the king summoned the barons to attend him at Portsmouth, in order to pass over with him into France; but the barons, who assembled at Leicester, refused to go over with him, unless he would first restore them to their privileges, as he had promised before his coronation. The king, instead of giving them any satisfaction, began to take violent measures against them; and they, not being sufficiently prepared for their defence, at last submitted; and came to the king at Portsmouth; but when they were come, he dispensed with their attendance, upon their paying him two marks of silver for every knight's fee. King John went over to Normandy, having sent the earl of Pembroke thither with some troops before him; and what by the arms of Philip king of France, his policy and intrigues, and what by the unaccountable negligence and inactivity of John, the whole province of Normandy was reunited to the crown of France, in the year 1204, after it had been severed from it 320 years, during the government of twelve dukes, of which king John was the last; and nothing was left to John but the duchy of Guienne. But what seemed to render John completely hateful to his subjects, was the murder of his nephew Arthur, who, by an indiscreet ardour in his military enterprises, had fallen into the hands of his uncle, and was shut up in the castle of Rouen. It was at midnight when John came in a boat to the place, and ordered the young prince to be brought before him. Long confinement, solitude, and the continuance of bad fortune, had now broken this generous youth's spirit; and perceiving that his death was meditated, he threw himself in the most imploring manner upon his knees before his uncle, and begged for mercy. John was too much hardened in the school of tyranny to feel any pity for his wretched suppliant. His youth, his affinity, his merits, were all disregarded, or were even obnoxious in a rival. The barbarous tyrant, making no reply, stabbed him with his own hands; and fastening a stone to the dead body, threw it into the Seine. This inhuman action thus rid John of an hated rival; but, happily for the instruction of after princes, it opened the way to his future ruin. Having in this manner shewn himself the enemy of mankind, in the prosperity of his reign, the whole world seemed to turn their back upon him in his distress. About this time died queen Eleanor, widow of Henry II. and mother of John. Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, dying in 1205, John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, was, by the king's recommendation, chosen by the whole fraternity; whom Pope Innocent III. refused to confirm, and ordered them to chuse cardinal Stephen Langton, an Englishman then at Rome, threatening them with excommunication unless they complied, which at last they did with great reluctance; and the pope immediately confirmed the election, and consecrated Langton with his own hands. John imagining this to have been the act of the whole body, expelled all the monks of St. Austin from their monastery, and banished them out of the kingdom. He wrote a sharp letter to the pope, unbraiding him with his unjust proceedings, and threatened to break off all intercourse with Rome, unless he revoked what he had done. But Innocent, bent upon carrying his point, laid the whole kingdom under an interdict; the effect of which was, that divine service ceased in all the churches, and the sacraments ceased to be administered, except to infants and dying persons; the church-yards shut up, and the dead buried without any priest daring to assist at the funerals. King John, to be even with the pope, confiscated the estates of all the ecclesiastics who obeyed the interdict; he also ordered all the concubines of the priests, of which there were many, to be shut up in prison, and would not let them out without their paying large fines. And as there were some priests, who, in spite of the interdict, administered the sacraments, the king took them under his protection, and ordered the magistrates to hang on the spot all that should molest them; which, as soon as the pope was informed of, he excommunicated all such as disobeyed the interdict, or complied with the king's orders. Though John remained still inflexible, he was not without his fears, as the people generally took part with the pope; and therefore, for his better security, he raised an army under pretence of making war upon Scotland, and caused all his vassals to renew their homage to him. The pope, finding that the interdict, which had been in force above a year, had not produced the effect he designed, proceeded to excommunicate the king, though the sentence was not published till some time after. In the mean time John led his army into Ireland, against the king of Connaught, who had raised some disturbances there. At Dublin he received the homage of above thirty petty princes; after which, having taken the king of Connaught prisoner, an end was put to this commotion, and the whole island remained in obedience to the king, who, before his departure, caused the laws and customs of England to be established in Ireland. The pope absolved John's subjects from their allegiance, solemnly deposed him, and empowered the king of France to put the sentence into execution, promising him remission for all his sins, together with the crown of England, as soon as he should have dethroned the tyrant. Accordingly, Philip made great preparations to invade England. In this crisis, Pandolph came over with the character of legate to England; and so wrought upon the king's fears, that he resigned the kingdom of England and lordship of Ireland to the pope, and acknowledged himself a vassal of the holy see. Philip, notwithstanding the pope's prohibition, still continued his preparations for invading England, which the earl of Flanders opposing, he sent his fleet to his coast; whereupon John sent a fleet under the earl of Salisbury, which totally destroyed the French fleet; and this put a stop to Philip's designs against England. And now the discontents of the barons having risen to a great height, and cardinal Langton siding with them, he shewed them the charter of king Henry I. advising them to make it the ground of their demands. Hereupon they entered into a confederacy to stand by one another, till their grievances were redressed, and their ancient privileges were confirmed. Upon the king's return from France, the barons, having prepared themselves for war, in case the king should refuse to comply with their demands in a peaceable way, came in a body to the king about Christmas, and insisted on the restitution of the laws of St. Edward. The king was afraid to give them a flat denial, but told them they should have an answer at Easter; at which time, in the year 1215, the great men, with above 2000 knights, well mounted and armed, besides other horse and foot, met at Stamford, and advanced to meet the king at Oxford; who, being afraid to trust himself with them in conference, dispatched the earl of Pembroke to know their demands. They immediately sent back a long writing, containing the laws and customs of the kingdom in the time of the Saxons; and declared if the king would not confirm them, they would compel him to it by seizing his castles. John having read over the articles, fell into a violent passion, and swore he would never comply with them; upon which the barons chose a general knight, Fitzwalter, giving him the title of Marshal of the Army of God, and of the holy Church; and marching to London, were received by the citizens, and besieged the king in the Tower. The king sent the earl of Pembroke to let them know he would comply with their demands. Accordingly both parties meeting on a day appointed, in a meadow called Runnymede, between Staines and Windsor, the king, seemingly with a good will, though compelled to it by force, signed two charters, containing all that the barons desired; the one called the Charter of Liberties, or the Great Charter, (Magna Charter,) and the other the Charter of Forests. They were not only signed by the king, but by all the lords spiritual and temporal, sealed with the great seal, and confirmed by the king's solemn oath. But the king soon repented of what he had done, and sent over his confidants into Germany, France, and Flanders, to enlist men, promising them the confiscated estates of his rebellious barons, as he called them. He also wrote to the pope, who zealously espoused his cause, excommunicated the barons, annulled the charters, and absolved the king from the oath he had taken to observe them. However, the barons made light of the pope's thunderings, and seized upon Rochester, where was a vast quantity of provisions which the king had laid up. But the foreign army being arrived, who were very numerous, all soldiers of fortune, John retook Rochester; and then dividing his army into two bodies, the earl of Salisbury with one ravaged the southern counties, whilst the king with the other did the same by the northern. The barons, finding themselves not strong enough to keep the field, shut themselves up in London. In this distress they had recourse to a dangerous expedient; which was, to invite over Lewis, son to the king of France, promising to place the crown on his head, if he would come with a force sufficient to rescue them from the tyranny of John. Philip sent over his son with a numerous army, notwithstanding the pope's prohibition, and his threatening prince Lewis with excommunication the moment he set foot on English ground. That prince landed March 21, 1216, and soon made himself master of the whole county of Kent, except Dover castle. He then marched to London, where the barons and citizens took the oaths of allegiance to him. From this time he acted as sovereign. In the mean time John was in perpetual motion, marching from place to place, by all means avoiding coming to battle. His grief at length threw him into a fever, of which he died at Newark, October 18, 1216, in the 51st year of his age, and 18th of his reign, and was buried in the cathedral of Worcester. John was in his person taller than the middle size, of a good shape and agreeable countenance. With respect to his disposition, we find him slothful, shallow, proud, imperious, sudden, rash, cruel, vindictive, perfidious, cowardly, libidinous, and inconstant; abject in adversity, and overbearing in success; contemned and hated by his subjects, over whom he tyrannized to the utmost of his power; abhorred by the clergy, whom he oppressed with exactions; and despised by all the neighbouring princes of Europe. Nevertheless it must be owned that his reign is not altogether barren of laudable transactions. He regulated the form of the civil government in the city of London, and several other places in the kingdom; he was the first who coined sterling money, introduced the laws of England into Ireland, and granted to the Cinque-ports those privileges of which they are still possessed.

JOHN O' GROAT'S HOUSE, the remains of the noted house, reckoned the most northerly dwelling in Scotland, and so called from a family of the name of Groat, who formerly resided here, and to whom the village and ferry, from this place to the Orkneys, belonged. This place has often been visited by travellers. It is situated one mile west of Duncansbay or Dungisbay Head.

JOHN, SAINT, (the Evangelist) was by birth a Galilean, by trade a fisherman, as was his father Zebedee, and his brother St. James, and from this occupation they were both called to be disciples and apostles of our blessed Saviour. He is called the disciple whom Jesus in a particular manner loved. He wrote the Gospel which goes by his name, in which the divinity and godhead of our Saviour is clearly asserted, against the Gnostics, who began even in that early age to deny it. He wrote also three epistles; the first catholic or general, the other two addressed to different persons, which have always been very highly esteemed in all ages of the church. He is also, by almost all the ancients, acknowledged to be the author of the book of the Revelation, which he wrote while under banishment in the isle of Patmos; whither he was sent by the tyrant Domitian, who, as Tertullian writes, had before this commanded him, for his strict adherence to the Christian faith, to be thrown into a caldron of burning or boiling oil; but from this danger he was miraculously delivered, and lived to return, under the emperor Nerva, to Ephesus, where he died at the age of an hundred years, and was there buried.

JOHNA'PPLE, s. a good sharp juicy apple.

JO'NKIOPING, or Jorterkoping, a town of Sweden, capital of the province of Smoland, and seat of the superior court of justice for Gothland. The houses are chiefly of wood covered with turf; for, excepting the largest towns and country seats, few of the buildings in Sweden are roofed with tiles. They are principally covered with turf or moss; no thatching being used, as both too dear, and too dangerous in case of fire. In order to keep out the rain, large layers of birch bark are spread over the timber work of the roof, and covered with turf or moss. The town, which contains about 3000 inhabitants, and has a manufacture of arms, is seated on the S. side of the Lake Wetter, 50 miles N. W. of Calmar. Lat. 57. 48. N. lon. 14. 7. E.

IPECACUANHA, s. in the Materia Medica, is an Indian root, of which there are two kinds, distinguished by their colour, and brought from different places, but both possessing the same virtues, though in a different degree. The one is gray, and brought from Peru; the other brown, and brought from the Brazils. The gray Ipecacuanha is preferable to the brown, as the latter is apt to operate more roughly. It is an excellent, mild, and safe emetic, a noble restringent, and the greatest of all remedies for a dysentery.

IPSWICH, an ancient and populous, but irregularly built, town of Suffolk, seated on the river Orwell, near the place where the fresh and salt water meet, forming a sort of half-moon, or crescent on its bank. Across the river there is a bridge leading to Stoke Hamlet. Here are several public buildings and a custom-house with a good quay. It has declined, however, from its former consequence; the manufactures of broad cloth and canvass are at an end; and its present commerce depends upon the malting and exportation of corn to London; and timber to the different dock-yards. It has a considerable coasting trade, and a small share of foreign commerce, and has lately sent ships to Greenland. Vessels of great burden are obliged to stop at some distance below the town. It is 20 miles N. E. of Colchester, and 69 N. E. of London. Markets on Tuesday and Thursday for small meat, on Wednesday and Friday for fish, and on Saturday for provisions of all kinds. This town is noted for being the birth-place of Cardinal Wolsey. Its inhabitants, in 1811, amounted to 13,670.

IRA'SCIBLE, a. [irascibilis, low Lat. irascible, Fr.] easily provoked to anger; belonging to the passion of anger.

IRE, s. [Fr. ira. Lat.] hatred arising from considering a thing as capable of affecting, or having affected us with an injury.

I'REBY, a town of Cumberland, with a market on Thursday. Many Roman antiquities have been dug up here. It is at present a good town; and is divided into the higher and lower. It is 303 miles N. N. W. of London.

I'REFUL, a. angry; raging.

I'REFULLY, ad. in a manner which shews great anger.

I'RELAND, one of the British islands, lying to the W. of that of Great Britain. It is bounded on the E. by St. George's Channel, or the Irish Sea, which separates it from England and Wales; on the N. E. by a channel about 20 miles broad, which separates it from Scotland; and on every other side by the ocean. It lies between lon. 5. 43. and 10. 38. W. and between lat. 51. 15. and 55. 13. N. being about 287 miles in length, and 155 in breadth. It is divided into four provinces, viz. Ulster on the north; Munster, on the south; Leinster, on the east; and Connaught on the west. These are subdivided into 32 counties, viz. Carlow, Dublin, Kildare, Kilkenny, King's County, Lonford, Lowth, Meath, Queen's County, West Meath, Wexford, Wicklow, in the province of Leinster. Antrim, Armagh, Cavan, Down, Donegal, Fermanah, Londonderry, Monaghan, and Tyrone, in the province of Ulster. Clare, Cork, Kerry, Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, in the province of Munster. Galway, Leitrim, Mayo, Roscommon, and Sligo, in the province of Connaught. The air is mild and temperate, being cooler in Summer, and warmer in winter than in England; though it is not so clear and pure, nor so proper for ripening corn and fruits. It is more humid than in England; but this quality is pretty much mended, and will be more so, when the bogs and morasses are drained. In general, it is a fruitful country, well watered with lakes and rivers; and the soil, in most parts, is very good and fertile; even in those places where the bogs and morasses have been drained, there is good meadow ground. It produces corn, hemp, and flax, in great plenty; and the herds of cattle are so numerous, that their beef and butter are exported to foreign parts; the English, and foreign ships, frequently come to victual in Irish ports. The principal riches and commodities of Ireland are, cattle, hides, wool, tallow, suet, butter, cheese, wood, salt, honey, wax, furs, hemp, and more especially fine linen cloth, which they have brought to great perfection, and their trade in it is vastly increased. This country is exceedingly well situate for foreign trade, and has many secure and commodious bays, creeks, and harbours, especially on the west coast. Their laws differ but little from those of England; and the national establishment of religion is the same. The members of parliament usually sat for life, unless upon the demise of the king of Great Britain; but, in 1768, their parliaments were made octennial. Formerly this kingdom was entirely subordinate to that of Great Britain, whose parliament could make laws to bind the people of Ireland; and an appeal might be made from their courts of justice to the house of lords in England; but, in 1782, it was declared, that although Ireland was an imperial crown, inseparably annexed to that of Britain, (on which connection the interest and happiness of both nations essentially depended) yet the kingdom of Ireland was distinct, with a parliament of its own, and that no body of men were competent to make laws for Ireland, except the king, lords, and commons thereof. And some time after, this declaration being thought insufficient, the British legislature, by an express act of parliament for that purpose, relinquished all claim of right to interfere with the judgment of the Irish courts, or to make laws to bind Ireland in time to come. However, in 1801, an Union of the two governments took place, under the title of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Ireland now sends 4 spiritual and 28 temporal lords, and 100 commoners, to meet in the Imperial Parliament. The lord lieutenant of Ireland, as well as the council, are appointed from time to time by the king. The native Irish are described as impatient of abuse and injury, quick of apprehension, implacable in resentment, ardent in all their affections, and remarkably hospitable. In the country, there certainly remains a great deal of this amiable national characteristic; and even in their towns, formality and etiquette are often so lost in hearty salutations, and a familiar manner of address, that the stranger soon feels himself at home, and imagines the people about him all relations. There are some considerable mountains in Ireland, the chief of which are the Knock Patrick, Sliew Blocmy, and Curliou Hills. Of all its bogs, that called the Bog of Allen is the most considerable. The chief Lakes are Lough Lean, Lough Erne, Lough Neagh, and Lough Coribb; and its principal rivers are the Shannon, Boyne, Barrow, Liffey, Nore, and Suir. This country is said to have been formerly full of woods, but the case is now so different, that it has been found necessary to plant new ones, and to give parliamentary encouragement for their preservation and increase. The mineral productions of this country have been little known till of late years, the natives in general having given themselves (at least for some centuries past) little trouble about them. Nevertheless, copper, lead, iron, and even silver ores, have been found in the Irish mines; some vestiges of works of this sort appear at Clontarf, on the edge of Dublin Bay. In the county of Antrim, there is a mine which consists of a mixture of silver and lead, every 30lbs. of lead ore producing about a pound of silver. There is another in Connaught, of the same kind; and one still richer in Wicklow. About 12 miles from Limerick, two mines have been discovered, one of copper, and the other of lead. Iron mines are dispersed all over the kingdom. There are likewise quarries of marble, slate, and freestone; and the earth produces, in various places, coal and turf for firing.

IRIS, s. [Lat.] the rainbow. In Philosophy, an appearance of light resembling the rainbow. In Botany, the flower-de-luce. In Anatomy, the circle round the pupil of the eye, from whence it receives the appellation of black, blue, &c. according to the colour.

IRON, s. [iren, Sax.] a well-known metal; though lighter than all others, excepting tin, yet considerably the hardest; when pure, malleable, but in a less degree than gold, silver, lead, or copper. It is more capable of rust than other metals, and requires the strongest fire to melt it. Most other metals are brittle while they are hot; but this is the most malleable the nearer it approaches to fusion. It is the only known substance attracted by the loadstone, is not only soluble in the stronger acids, but even in common water, to which its specific gravity is as 7632 to 1000. Any instrument or utensil made of iron; as a flat iron, box iron, or smoothing iron. A chain, shackle, or manacle; as, "he was put in irons." In these two last senses it has a plural.

ISLEWORTH, a town of Middlesex, 9 miles W. of London. It is seated on the river Thames, opposite to Richmond. Near it is Sion-house, the magnificent seat of the duke of Northumberland. Inhabitants, 14,661.

ISLIP, a town of Oxfordshire, chiefly noted for the birth and baptism of Edward the Confessor. The chapel wherein Edward was baptised, at a small distance N. from the church, was desecrated during Cromwell's usurpation, and converted to the meanest uses of a farm-yard. It is built of stone, 15 yards long, and 7 broad, and retains traces of the arches of an oblong window at the E. end. At present it has a roof of thatch, and is still called the king's chapel. The manor was given by Edward the Confessor to Westminster Abbey, to which it still belongs. It has also some remains of an ancient palace, said to have been king Ethelred's. By the Oxfordshire canal, it communicates with the late inland navigations. It has a good market for sheep, and is 56 miles N. W. of London, on the road to Aberystwith.

ISMAIL, a town of Bessarabia. It was taken by storm by the Russians under General Suwarrow on the 22d of December 1790; and it is said, that the long siege and the capture did not cost less than 20,000 men. The most atrocious part of the transaction was, that the garrison, (whose firmness would have received, from a less sanguinary foe, the highest applause) were massacred by the merciless conquerors, to the amount of, by their own account, 30,000 men, and the place was abandoned to the fury of the brutal soldiery. Ismail is seated on the north side of the Danube, 140 miles S. W. of Ockzahow. Lat. 45. 11. N. lon. 29. 30. E.

ISO'CHRONAL, or ISO'CHRONOUS, a. [from ἴσος, and χρόνος, Gr.] is applied to such vibrations of a pendulum as are performed in the same space of time.

ISO'SCELES, s. [isoscele, Fr.] applied to a triangle which has two sides equal.

ISPAHAN, a celebrated city of Asia, and capital of Persia, thought by some to be the finest city in the East. It stands in the middle of a plain, surrounded on all sides with mountains, at eight miles' distance, which rise gradually in the form of an amphitheatre. There is no river, except a small one, called Senderut, which supplies almost all the houses with water. It is 20 miles in circumference, with well-built houses, and flat roofs, on which they walk, eat, and lie, in the summer-time, for the sake of the cool air. Here are a great number of magnificent palaces, and that of the king is two miles and a half in circumference. There are 160 mosques, 1800 large caravansaries, about 200 public baths, a prodigious number of coffee-houses, and very fine bazars and streets, on which are canals planted on each side with trees. The streets are not paved, but always clean, on account of the dryness of the air, for it seldom rains or snows here. Near this city, about A. D. 1030, was fought a great battle between Tangrolipix, general of the Turks, and Mahomet, sultan of Persia, (who had revolted from the great caliph of the Saracens,) in which the sultan happening to break his neck by a fall from his horse, the kingdom, by the agreement of both armies, devolved to the Turkish general. This was the beginning of the kingdom of the Seljukian Turks in Persia, which prospered near 200 years, till its overthrow by Hoccata, the son of Zingis, the great cham of Tartary. It is 265 miles N. E. of Bussorah, 300 S. of the Caspian sea, and 1400 S. E. of Constantinople. Lon. 52. 55. E. lat. 32. 25. N.

ISSEQUIBO, a flourishing settlement of the Dutch, in Guiana, S. America, contiguous to that of Demerary, and 8 or 10 miles W. of the town of Surinam. It is seated on the river Issequibo, which is about three leagues wide at its mouth, and runs into the Atlantic in lat. 6. 45. N. and lon. 63. 20. W. being more than 300 miles long. Its principal productions are sugar, coffee, and cotton. It has been often taken by the English, and restored to the Dutch on the making of peace.

ISRAELITES, s. the descendants of Israel or Jacob, who were at first called Hebrews, by reason of Abraham, who came from the other side of the Euphrates; and afterwards Israelites, from Israel the father of the twelve Patriarchs; and, lastly, Jews.

ISSUE, s. [issue, Fr.] the act of passing out; passage outwards; an event, or the consequence of any action. In Surgery, a hole made in the flesh by incision, for the discharge of humours. Progeny, offspring. The profits growing from an amercement. The point of matter depending on a suit, wherein the parties join, and put the cause to the trial of a jury. Hence, to join issue, is to agree upon some particular point, on which the decision of a cause shall rest.

To ISSUE, v. n. [uscire, Ital.] to come or pass out at any place. To proceed, applied to offspring. To be produced or gained, applied to funds or trade. To run out in lines. Actively, to send out by authority, or judicially, used with out; this sense is most common.

ISSUELESS, a. without offspring or children.

ISTHMUS, ist-mus, s. [Lat.] in Geography, is a narrow neck of land that joins two continents, or joins a peninsula to the terra firma, and separates two seas. The most celebrated isthmuses are that of Panama, or Darien, which joins North and South America, and that of Suez, which connects Asia and Africa; that of Corinth, of Crim Tartary, &c.

IT, pron. [hit, Sax.] the neuter demonstrative, made use of in speaking of things. Sometimes it is used absolutely for the state of a person or affairs. "How is it?" Shak. Sometimes elliptically for the thing, matter, or affair. "It's come to pass." Shak. After neutral verbs, it is used either ludicrously, or to give an emphasis. "A mole courses it on the ground." Spect.

ITALY, a large peninsula of Europe, having the Alps on the N. by which it is separated from France; and it is surrounded on all other sides by the Mediterranean sea. It is the most celebrated country in Europe, having been formerly the seat of the Roman empire, and is now of the Pope. It is so fine and fruitful a country, that it is commonly called the garden of Europe. The air is temperate and wholesome, except in the territory of the Church, where it is very different. The soil is fertile, and produces wheat, rice, wine, oil, oranges, citrons, pomegranates, all sorts of fruits, flowers, honey, and silk; and in the kingdom of Naples are cotton and sugar. The forests are full of all sorts of game, and on the mountains are fine pastures which feed a great many cattle. Here are also mines of sulphur, iron, several quarries of alabaster, jasper, and all kinds of marble. Italy is a mountainous country; for besides the Alps, which bound it on the N. there are the Appennines, running quite across it from E. to W. as well as mount Vesuvius, which is a volcano, and vomits flames; besides several others. The principal rivers are the Po, the Tiber or Tivere, the Arno, the Adda, and the river Edige. Italy, before the French Revolution, was divided into a number of states, which differed much in extent and importance. Between the confines of France and Switzerland, on the west and north, were the continental dominions of the king of Sardinia, namely, Piedmont, Savoy, Montserrat, part of the Milanese, and Oneglia. To the north-east, the territories of Venice. South of these, the dominions of the emperor of Germany, namely, part of the Milanese and the Mantuan; and south of these, Modena, Mirandola, and Reggio. West of these, the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Gustalla. To the south of Parma, the republic of Genoa; and south-east of this, that of Lucca. Hence extended along the coast of the Mediterranean, the Grand Duchy of Tuscany; and north-east and east of Tuscany, the Ecclesiastical State, or territory of the pope, between the Gulf of Venice and the Mediterranean: all south of this, the kingdom of Naples, with its dependent islands. Since the Revolution, Piedmont, Savoy, Nice, Genoa, &c. were annexed to France. The duchies of Modena, Milan, and Mantua, with Ferrara, Bologna, Romagna, &c. were erected into a government, called the Cisalpine Republic; this was afterwards, with some additions, formed into the kingdom of Italy, of which Napoleon was sovereign. With his power, have fallen his kingdom and principalities; most of the former reverting to Austria, and the latter to their ancient masters. No country has produced better politicians, historians, poets, musicians, painters, and sculptors, than Italy. The Italians generally are well-proportioned, but have but indifferent complexions. With respect to dress, they follow the fashions of the countries on which they border, or to which they are subject. They are affable, courteous, ingenious, and sober; but extremely jealous, vindictive, lascivious, ceremonious, and superstitious. In their dispositions they are a medium between the French and Spaniards, neither so gay and volatile as the one, nor so grave and solemn as the other. Their food is generally of the vegetable kind, which contributes to their contentment and satisfaction; and an Italian gentleman or peasant can be luxurious at a small expence. The women affect yellow hair, as did formerly the Roman ladies and courtezans. Masquerades, gaming, horse-races, without riders, and conversations or assemblies, are the chief diversions of the Italians, excepting religious exhibitions, in which they are extremely pompous.

ITCH, s. [gicha, Sax.] in Medicine, a disease which overspreads the body with pustules, attended with an irritating sensation, and communicated by contact; the sensation of uneasiness caused by the itch, or appeased by rubbing. Figuratively, a constant teasing desire.

ITCHY, a. infected with the itch.

ITEM, s. [Lat.] a new article; a hint or inuendo. Used adverbially in wills for also. "Item, I give and bequeath."

ITERANT, part. [iterans, Lat.] repeating.

To ITERATE, v. a. [itero, Lat.] to repeat the same thing; to inculcate by frequent mention or repetition; to do a second time.

ITERATION, s. [iteratio, Lat.] repetition or recital.

ITINERANT, a. [Fr.] wandering; not settled; travelling.

ITINERARY, s. [itinerarium, Lat.] a book of travels.

ITTNERARY, a. [itinerarius, Lat.] travelling; done on a journey; done during frequent change of place.

ITSELF, pron. [hit, and sylf, Sax.] the neutral reciprocal pronoun, applied to things.

JUAN FERNANDEZ, an island in the S. Sea, about 12 miles long and 6 wide. It is 330 miles W. of the coast of Chili, parallel with St. Jago. It is uninhabited, but having a good harbour on the N. coast, called Cumberland Bay, it is found extremely convenient to touch at, and water.—Alexander Selkirk, a Scotchman, resided alone on this island nearly five years, and was brought back to Europe about the year 1710. From the history of this recluse, Daniel de Foe is said to have written his adventures of Robinson Crusoe. Lat. 33. 40. S. lon. 83. W.

JUBILANT, part. [jubilans, Lat.] uttering songs of triumph.

JUBILATION, s. [jubilatio, Lat.] the act of uttering songs of triumph, or of declaring triumph.

JUBILEE, s. [jubilé, Fr. from jubilo, Lat. a musical instrument, so called from Jubal the inventor] a public festivity; a time of rejoicing: a great church festival celebrated at Rome, originally once every hundred years, wherein the pope grants plenary indulgence to all sinners, especially such as visit the churches of St. Peter and Paul at Rome. It was first established by Boniface VIII. in 1300. Clement VI. reduced it to 50 years; Urban VI. to every 25th; and Sextus IV. to every 23d year.

JUCUNDITY, s. [jucunditas, Lat.] pleasantness, agreeableness.

To JUDAIZE, v. n. [judaizer, Fr.] to conform to the manners or customs of the Jews

JUDGE, s. [juge, Fr.] one who is empowered or authorised to hear and determine any cause or question, real or personal, and presides in a court of judicature. Figuratively, one who has skill sufficient to discover and pronounce upon the merit of any thing.

To JUDGE, v. n. [juger, Fr.] to decide or determine a question; to pass sentence; to discern or distinguish.

JUDGER, s. one who forms an opinion or passes sentence.

JUDGES, Book of, a canonical book of the Old Testament, so called from relating the state of the Israelites under the administration of several illustrious persons, who were called Judges.

JUDGMENT, s. [jugement, Fr.] that power of the mind whereby we join ideas together, by affirming or denying any thing concerning them; the quality or power of discerning the propriety or impropriety of things; the right, power, or act of passing sentence; decision; opinion; sentence passed against a criminal; condemnation, or punishment inflicted by Providence for any particular crime; the distribution of justice; the sentence passed on our actions on the last day; the last doom.

JUDICATORY, s. [from judico, Lat.] distribution of justice; a court of justice.

JUDICATURE, s. [Fr.] the power or province of dispensing justice, or hearing causes and passing sentence.

JUDICIAL, a. [judicialis, Lat.] practised in the distribution of justice, or in a court of justice; inflicted as a penalty; belonging to a judge or court of justice.

JUDICIALLY, ad. in the forms of legal justice; in a court of justice; before a judge.

JUDICIARY, a. [judiciarius, Lat.] passing judgment upon any thing.

JUDICIOUS, a. [judicieux, Fr.] prudent; wise; skilful in any affair.

JUDICIOUSLY, ad. in a manner which speaks an extensive judgment or understanding; justly or wisely.

IVES, ST. a sea-port town of Cornwall, with two markets, on Wednesday and Saturday. It is only frequented by fishermen, for the taking of pilchards. However, it is a corporation, and sends two members to parliament. It is 276 miles W. by S. of London.

IVES, ST. a town of Huntingdonshire, with the largest market in England for cattle, except that of Smithfield. It is an ancient, large, and handsome place, seated on the river Ouse, over which it has a fine stone bridge, six miles nearly E. of Huntingdon, and 59 N. of London. Market on Monday.

JUG, s. [jugge, Dan.] a large drinking vessel with a long neck, swelling out towards the bottom.

To JUGGLE, v. n. [jouglor, Fr.] to play tricks by sleight of hand; to practice or impose on by artifice and imposture.

JUGGLE, s. a trick performed by sleight of hand; an imposture, fraud, or deception.

JUGGLER, s. one who practises sleight of hand, or performs tricks by nimble conveyance; a cheat or impostor.

JUGGLINGLY, ad. in an unfair or deceitful manner.

JUGULAR, a. [from jugulum, Lat.] situated in, or belonging to, the throat.

JIVICA, an island of the Mediterranean, about 15 miles long, and 12 wide, subject to Spain. It is mountainous, but fertile in corn, wine, and fruits; and is remarkable for the great quantity of salt made in it. It is 50 miles S. W. of Majorca. The capital is of the same name, which is little more than a fortress, is seated on a bay, with a good harbour. Lat. 39. 30. N. lon. 1. 25. E.

JUICE, (pronounced juce, both in this word and its derivatives) s. [jus, Fr. juys, Belg.] the liquor, sap, or water of a plant; the fluid or moisture in animal bodies.

JUICELESS, a. dry; without moisture or juice.

JUICINESS, s. plenty of juice or moisture, applied both to plants and animals.

JUICY, a. moist; full of moisture or juice.

JIVINGHOE, a town in Buckinghamshire, has a market on Friday, and is distant from London 33 miles.

JUJUB, or JUJUBES, s. a plant whose flower consists of several leaves, which are placed circularly, and expand in form of a rose; the fruit is like a small plum, but has little flesh upon the stone.

To JUKE, v. n. [jucher, Fr.] to perch as birds do upon a tree.

JULAP, s. [julep, Fr.] in Pharmacy, an agreeable potion usually made of simple and compound waters sweetened, and used sometimes as a vehicle to such medicines as cannot be taken alone.

JULIAN YEAR, is that lately used in England, and several other countries, called the old year, introduced by Julius Cesar, which for three years together has but 365 days, but every fourth year 366 days, upon account that six hours and 365 days was the mean solar year, and four times six hours made one natural day; but this, by experience, is found too much by about 11 minutes; so that in about 131 years, this account will be one day too late, which occasions the difference between the Julian and the Gregorian account of the year.

JULUS, s. July flower; also those worm-like tufts or palms in willows, hazels, and walnut trees.

JULY, s. [Julius, Lat.] the name affixed to the seventh month of the year from January, by the Romans, in honour of Julius Cesar, which before his time was named Quintilis, or the fifth, i. e. from March.

JUMART, s. [Fr.] a beast got from a mixture of a bull and a mare.

To JUMBLE, v. a. to mix in a confused and violent manner together. Neuterly, to be agitated or shaken together.

JUMBLE, s. a confused mixture; a violent and confused shaking.

To JUMP, v. n. [gumpen, Belg.] to move forward by raising one's self from the ground into the air; to leap; to jolt.

JUMP, s. the act of springing or raising one's feet from the ground in the air; a leap, or skip. Figuratively, a lucky chance. A kind of loose or limber stays, with a moveable stomacher, usually laced or tied before, from jupe, Fr.

JUNCATE, s. [juncade, Fr.] a cheese-cake; any kind of a delicacy; a private or clandestine entertainment: now improperly written junket.

JUNCOUS, a. [junceus, Lat.] full of bulrushes.

JUNCTION, s. [jonction, Fr.] union; coalition.

JUNCTURE, s. [jonctura, Lat.] the line or part in which two things are joined together; a joint, joining, or articulation; union. A critical point or period of time.

JUNE, s. [Junius, Lat. because this month was dedicated to Juno; or because it was appropriated to young people (junioribus) as May was to old ones] the sixth month of the year from January.

JUNIOR, s. a person younger than another.

JUNIPER, s. [juniperus, Lat.] a plant which produces the berries of which gin is made.

JUNK, s. [junco, Span.] a small ship used in China; pieces of old cable, JUNKET, s. See JUNCATE.

JUNTO, s. [Ital.] a company of men combined in any secret design; cabal.

IVORY, s. [ivoire, Fr.] a hard, solid, firm substance, of a fine white colour, capable of a good polish, and is the tusks of the elephant. Adjectively, it signifies any thing made of ivory; as, "an ivory ball."

IVORY COAST, a country of Africa, on the coast of the Atlantic, between Cape Appolonia and Cape Palmas. The chief commodities are gold, ivory, and slaves.

JUPITER, s. [Lat.] in the Newtonian Astronomy, is one of the superior planets. He is about 494 millions of miles from the sun; and by moving at the rate of 29840 miles every hour in his orbit, completes his periodic revolution in 11yrs. 315d. 8h. 58m. 27 $\frac{3}{8}$ s. but his sidereal period, or the time in which he moves from one fixed star to the same again, is performed in 11yrs. 317d. 8h. 51m. 25 $\frac{3}{8}$ s. His synodic revolution, or the time from one of his conjunctions with the sun to the next, is finished in 398d. 21h. 15m. 45s. at a mean rate. His contents surpass that of all the other planets put together, his diameter being 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ of the earth's, or about 90250 miles, and consequently he is 1479 times larger than our globe. His greatest apparent diameter, as seen from the earth, is about 46" of a degree. He turns round his axis at the prodigious velocity of about 28500 miles per hour at his equator, in 9h. 55m. 36 $\frac{3}{8}$ s. and therefore there are 1047 $\frac{1}{2}$ of such days in one of his years. The place of his aphelion, anno 1800, was in 11 deg. 14' 11" of Libra, and his north node in 9 deg. 6' of Cancer; the annual motion of the former being $1' 2''$, and of the latter only $1'$. His eccentricity is $\frac{1}{20}$ of his mean distance from the sun, and the equation of his orbit $5 \text{ deg. } 34' 1''$. Viewed from the earth, he appears sometimes to move according to the order of the signs, sometimes to stand still, and at other times to have a retrograde motion; which proves that the earth is not the centre of his orbit. The greatest number of days he can be retrograde in a synodic revolution is 122, in which time he moves about 13 deg. contrary to the order of the signs. His proportion of light and heat is $\frac{37}{1000}$ of the earth's, and density $\frac{23}{100}$ of the same. He is surrounded by faint substances parallel to each other, which astronomers have denominated Belts; and in which so many changes appear, that they have been supposed to be clouds by many writers, for some of them have been first interrupted and broken, and then have vanished entirely. They have sometimes been observed of different breadths, and afterwards have appeared of the same breadth. Large and various spots have been seen on these belts; and when those parts of the belts vanish, the spots also disappear. Four smaller planets, called satellites move round this stupendous globe, in shorter or longer periods, as they are nearer to, or further removed from, his centre; which affords a very strong argument in favour of the laws of gravity. The first, or nearest, makes a revolution round him in $1 \text{ d. } 18 \text{ h. } 27 \text{ m. } 33 \text{ s.}$ at the distance of 269000 miles from his centre; the second, at the distance of 428000 miles in $3 \text{ d. } 13 \text{ h. } 13 \text{ m. } 42 \text{ s.}$; the third, at the distance of 683000 miles, in $7 \text{ d. } 3 \text{ h. } 42 \text{ m. } 33 \text{ s.}$; and the fourth, at the distance of 1202000 miles, in $16 \text{ d. } 16 \text{ h. } 32 \text{ m. } 8 \text{ s.}$ All of them, by reason of their immense distance from us, seem to keep near their primary; and their apparent motion is like that of a pendulum, going alternately from their greatest distance on one side to their greatest distance on the other, sometimes in a straight line, but more frequently in an elliptic curve. When a satellite is in its superior semicircle, or that half of its orbit which is more distant from the earth than Jupiter is, its motion appears to us direct, according to the order of the signs; but in its inferior semicircle its motion appears retrograde, and both these motions seem quicker the nearer the satellites are to the centre of their primacy, slower the more distant they are, and at the greatest distance of all they appear for a short time to be stationary. The synodical revolutions of the four satellites respectively are; $1 \text{ d. } 18 \text{ h. } 28 \text{ m. } 36 \text{ s.}$ — $3 \text{ d. } 13 \text{ h. } 17 \text{ m. } 54 \text{ s.}$ — $7 \text{ d. } 3 \text{ h. } 59 \text{ m. } 36 \text{ s.}$ —and $16 \text{ d. } 18 \text{ h. } 5 \text{ m. } 7 \text{ s.}$ Their distances from Jupiter in semidiameters of that planet are respectively, $5\frac{265}{1000}$, $9\frac{494}{1000}$, $15\frac{141}{1000}$, and $26\frac{630}{1000}$. From the four satellites, the inhabitants of Jupiter will have four different kinds of months; the first divides his year into $2447\frac{1}{3}$ parts, the 2d into $1218\frac{2}{3}$ parts, the third into $604\frac{1}{3}$ parts, and 4th into $258\frac{1}{3}$ parts; so that the whole number of months in his year will be $4529\frac{1}{3}$. The three first satellites are eclipsed in every revolution, but the orbit of the 4th is so much inclined to the plane of Jupiter's orbit, that it escapes being eclipsed 2 years in every 6. The duration of a central eclipse of each of the satellites, beginning with the first, is, respectively, $2 \text{ h. } 15 \text{ m. } 50 \text{ s.}$ — $2 \text{ h. } 51 \text{ m. } 20 \text{ s.}$ — $3 \text{ h. } 34 \text{ m.}$ —and $4 \text{ h. } 46 \text{ m.}$ The eclipses of these satellites are of excellent use in determining the longitude of places on land. Obscurations of the sun to this planet happen almost every day, and with very good telescopes the circular shades of the satellites have been observed to pass over certain portions of his enlightened disk, in the same manner that the shade of our moon passes over the earth. Among the Alchemists, Jupiter signifies the philosopher's stone. Astrologers signify by it, magistrates, scholars, riches, pleasures, religion.

JURAT, s. [juratus, Lat.] a magistrate of the nature of an alderman.

JURATORY, a. [juratoire, Fr.] by means of, or by giving an oath.

JURIDICAL, a. [juridicus, Lat.] acting in the distribution of justice; used in the courts of justice.

JURIDICALLY, ad. with legal authority; according to forms of justice.

JURISCONSULT, s. [jurisconsultis, Lat.] one who gives his opinion in cases of law.

JURISDICTION, s. [jurisdictio, Lat.] legal authority; extent of power; a district to which authority belongs.

JURISPRUDENCE, s. [jurisprudentia, Lat.] the science of the law, either civil or common.

JURIST, s. [juriste, Fr.] one who professes the science of the law; a civilian.

JUROR, s. [from juro, Lat.] one who serves on a jury.

JURY, s. [juré, Fr.] a company of men, consisting of twelve or twenty-four, and sworn to deliver a truth upon such evidence as shall be laid before them touching the cause they are to decide. The grand jury consists ordinarily of twenty-four grave and substantial gentlemen, or some of them yeomen, chosen out of the whole shire by the sheriff, to consider of all bills of indictment preferred to the court; which they approve of by writing billa vera, or disallow by writing ignoramus, on them.

JURYMAN, s. one who is impanelled on a jury.

JURYMAST, s. something set up in the room of a mast lost in a fight or storm.

JUST, a. [justus, Lat.] unbiassed in distribution of justice; honest in dealing with others; exact, proper, accurate, or agreeable to the standard of justice; virtuous, or living conformably to the laws of morality; true; well-grounded; proportionate; regular.

JUST, ad. exactly; merely, or barely. "Just enough." Dryd. Nearly, or not far from. "Just at the point of death." Temple.

JUST, s. a mock encounter on horseback. See JOUST.

JUSTICE, s. [justicia, Lat.] the virtue whereby we give every one their due, inflict punishment on those that deserve it, and acquit the innocent after a fair trial. Figuratively, punishment; right, or the act whereby a person asserts his rights. In Law, it is a person deputed by the king to administer justice to his subjects. Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, is a lord by his office, and chief of the rest; he determines all such pleas as concern offences committed against the crown, dignity, or peace of the king. Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, is a lord by his office, and formerly did hear and determine all causes in common Law; from whence arose his title. Justice of the Forest, is a lord by his office, and with his assistants determines all offences within the king's forest, committed against venison and vert. Justices of Assize, are such as by special commission are sent into the country to take assizes. Justices in Eyre, or itinerant justices, are so called from erre, Fr. a journey, and were formerly sent by commission into different counties to try such causes particularly as were termed pleas of the crown. Justices of Gaol Delivery, are such as are commissioned to hear and determine all causes for which persons are cast into gaol. Justices of Nisi Prius, are the same as justices of the assize, and receive their name from the common adjournment of a cause in the common Pleas, "NISI PRIUS Justiciarii venerint ad eas partes," i. e. Unless the justices shall come to those parts before. Justices of the Peace, are persons appointed by the king's commission to keep the peace of the county in which they reside; and some of those, who are of superior rank or quality, are called Justices of the Quorum; and without the presence or assent of these, or at least one of them, no business of importance can be transacted. A Justice of the Peace ought to possess an estate of at least 100l. per annum in freehold or copyhold, for life, or for the term of 21 years, without incumbrances: and if a Justice of the Peace, not thus qualified, presume to act in that office, he is liable to the penalty of 100l.

JUSTICESHIP, s. the office, rank, or dignity of a justice. Used generally in a ludicrous sense.

JUSTICIABLE, a. proper to be examined in courts of justice.

JUSTICIARY, or COURT OF JUSTICIARY, s. in Scotland, a court of supreme jurisdiction in all criminal cases. The lords of justiciary likewise go circuits twice a year in the country.

JUSTIFIABLE, a. to be defended by law or reason; conformable to law or justice.

JUSTIFIABLENESS, s. the quality of being cleared from an accusation; the quality of being defensible by law or reason.

JUSTIFIABLY, ad. in such a manner as to be reconciled to law, reason, or justice.

JUSTIFICATION, s. [Fr.] a defence, vindication, or the act of clearing from an accusation of guilt; absolution from guilt; deliverance or acquittal by pardon from sins past.

JUSTIFICATIVE, a. justifying; serving to justify or prove.

JUSTIFICATOR, s. one who defends, vindicates, or clears from any charge of guilt.

JUSTIFIER, s. one who clears both from the charge and punishment of sin by arguments, by imputation of merits, and by pardon.

To JUSTIFY, v. a. [justifier, Fr.] to clear from any charge of guilt; to absolve or acquit from any accusation; to vindicate; to free from the guilt or punishment of past sin by pardon.

To JUSTLE, v. n. [jouster, Fr.] to encounter, clash, or run against each other. Actively, to push, drive, or force, by rushing against.

JUSTLY, ad. in a manner consistent with rigid justice and honesty. Figuratively, properly; exactly; in due proportion.

JUSTNESS, s. the exact conformity of things and actions to any law, rule, or standard; justice, propriety, or exactness.

To JUT, v. n. to push or shoot into prominences; to stand out beyond the other parts of the surface.

JUTLAND, a large peninsula of Denmark, bounded on the S. by the duchy of Holstein; and on the other sides by the German Ocean and Baltic Sea. It is about 200 miles in length from N. to S. and from 30 to 80 in breadth from E. to W. The air is very cold, but wholesome, and the soil is fertile in corn and pastures, which feed a great number of horses, beeves, and hogs, which are sent to Germany, Holland, &c. This was anciently called the Cimbrica Chersonesus; and is supposed to be the country whence the Anglo-Saxons came that conquered England. It is divided into two parts, called N. and S. Jutland; the latter being the duchy of Sleswick. North Jutland is composed of four general governments, each of which has its bishop and general governor. They derive their name from the four chief cities, Aalborg, Wiborg, Aarhuys, and Ripen.

JUTTY, s. a part of a building which stands out further than the rest.

JUVENILE, a. [juvenilis, Lat.] young, or youthful.

JUVENILITY, s. the state of youth; youthfulness.

JUXTAPOSED, a. placed near each other.

JUXTAPOSITION, s. [juxta and positio, Lat.] the state of being placed close to each other.

IVY, s. [ifg, Sax.] a particular plant of the evergreens that twines about trees, sticks to walls, or creeps on the ground. Its qualities in Medicine are drying and astringent; its berries purge upwards and downwards; and a gum, that distils from its trunk, upon being any ways cut, is reckoned a notable caustic, and is said to destroy the nits of the head.

K.

K is the tenth letter and seventh consonant of our alphabet. Its sound is much the same with that of the hard c, in acre, cure, come, and of q in question, quake, &c. and has before all the vowels one invariable sound; as in keen, ken, kid, kind. K is silent in the present pronunciation before n; as know, knife, knee, knave. It used formerly to be always joined with c at the end of words, but is at present very properly omitted; thus for publick, musick, arithmetick, &c. we write public, music, arithmetic, &c. However, in monosyllables, it is still retained; as in mock, slack, back, wreck, stick, &c. The Romans seldom used it, except in proper names, or as a numeral. The French make no use of it, except in proper names of men and places; yet we meet with risk, burlesk, in good authors, instead of risqu, burlesque. As a numeral, K denotes 250, and with a dash over it thus $\overline{K}$, 250,000.

KALENDAR, s. an account of time. See CALEND, or CALENDAR.

KALI, s. [Arab.] a plant growing on the sea coasts, whose ashes are of great use in making glass and soap.

KALMUCS, a nation of Tartars, who inhabit that part of the Russian government of Caucasus, that lies between the river Volga, and the river Yaick (now Ural) towards the Caspian Sea; in all which immense tract there is not a house to be seen, as they all live in tents, and remove from one place to another, in quest of pasturage for their large herds of cattle, consisting of horses, camels, cows, and sheep. They neither sow nor reap, nor make hay for their cattle, so that they live without bread, or any sort of vegetables; and in the winter their cattle fare as other wild beasts. Their food is flesh, (especially that of horses) fish, wild fowl, and venison; and they have great plenty of milk, butter, and cheese; but mare's milk is the most esteemed among them, and from it they make a strong spirit, of which they are very fond, and which is as clear as water. They are divided into a number of hordes or clans, each under their own particular khan, and all acknowledging the authority of one principal khan, who is called orchicurti-khan, or king of kings, and derives his pedigree from Tamerlane. All of them, however, have gradually submitted to the government of Russia, or live at present under its protection. They are pagans. They wear coats of stuff, or silk, above which they wear a large, wide, fur coat of sheep-skin, and a cap of the same. Their cattle are large; and their sheep are of the largest kind, having great fat tails weighing from 25 to 30 pounds; their ears hanging down like our dogs', and instead of wool, they have soft curled hair, so that their skins are converted into fur coats. Their horses are small, but swift, hardy, and strong; and many of them pace naturally, and trot at an incredible rate. They eat the flesh of camels, cows, and sheep, but universally give the preference to that of the horse. When they go upon any expedition, they have no regard either to bridges or boats; they no sooner come to a river, than in they plunge with their horses, and sliding from their backs, hold fast by their manes till they get over, and then immediately mount again, and proceed. They live but 4 months at most in the deserts, and inhabit a most pleasant country all the rest of the year (when it is not overflowed) tending their flocks and herds, fishing and hunting. When they go upon an expedition, every one takes a sheep with him for his provision, and three horses, which he rides alternately; and when any of them fail, they kill it, and divide the flesh, putting pieces of it under their saddles, and after riding some time upon it, they eat it without any farther preparation. Their kibbets, or tents, are large, and surprisingly warm, having a fire in the middle, and a hole at the top to let out the smoke; they are 24 feet in diameter, and capable of being enlarged or contracted at pleasure; they are all round, the sides being made of a kind of checkered wicker-work, and the cross sticks neatly jointed, for folding together, or extending; it withstands wind and rain well, and is erected with great ease. The small-pox is as much dreaded among the Kalmucs as the pestilence among us. When any of them are seized with it, they immediately break up their camp and flee, leaving the sick person in one of their kibbets, or tents, with a killed sheep, part of which is roasted and part raw, and a jar of water, and some wood for fire; if they recover, they follow the horde, but this seldom happens, for they mostly die for want of attendance. In a more extensive sense, however, the Kalmucs' country includes both the Kalmuc and Mongul Tartars, who both formerly composed but one people. The Mongul Tartars are partly independent, and partly subject to China.

KAMTSCHATKA, a peninsula of Siberia, in the government of Irkutskoi, bounded on the N. by the province of Ochotsk; on the E. and S. by the North Pacific Ocean; and on the W. by the Sea of Ochotsk and the Penzinskoe Gulf. It is about 600 miles in length, and from 30 to 200 in breadth. The southern extremity is Cape Lopatka, in lat. 41. 0½ N. and long. 156. 43. E. according to Capt. King, who visited this country in 1779. The true Kamtschadales are a people of very remote antiquity, and have for many ages inhabited this peninsula. There are, at present, very few idolaters among them, the Russians having bestowed great pains, and been very successful, in converting them to Christianity. Schools are likewise established in many of the ostrogs, where the children of both the natives and Cossacks are instructed gratuitously in the Russian language. The Russians first discovered this country in the year 1697, and, in 1699, sixty Russian soldiers, with as many Cossacks, penetrated into the heart of the peninsula, levying a tribute of furs in their progress. Their government, considered as a military one, is mild and equitable in a high degree. The natives are permitted to choose their own magistrates, with all the privileges they had ever enjoyed, who refer to the governor of Kamtschatka such cases only as, from their intricacy or heinousness, they do not choose to decide upon themselves. Bolcheretsk is the principal place, situated on the S. W. coast, in lat. 52. 55. N. lon. 156. 57. E.

KANGAROO, s. an animal of New Holland.

To KAW, v. n. to make a noise like a raven, crow or rook.

KAW, s. [from the sound] the cry of a raven, crow, or rook.

KAYLE, s. [quille, Fr.] ninepins; kettlepins, of which skittles seems a corruption.

To KECK, v. n. [hecken, Belg.] to heave the stomach; to retch at something nauseous or squeamish.

To KECKLE, v. a. to defend a cable round with rope.

KECKSEY, s. a name given in Staffordshire to hemlock, or any other hollow jointed plant.

To KEDGE, v. a. [kaghe, a small vessel, Belg.] in Navigation, to bring a ship up or down a narrow river by the wind, though the tide be contrary, by means of the kedge anchor.

KE'DGER, or KEDGE ANCHOR, s. a small anchor used in a river.

KE'DLACK, s. a weed, the same with the charnock.

KEEL, s. [cæli, Sax.] a principal piece of timber in a ship, which is usually first laid on the stocks in building. In Botany, a name given to the lowermost petal in a butterfly-shaped blossom, from its supposed resemblance to the keel of a ship.

To KEEL, v. a. [cælan, Sax.] to cool, or prevent from boiling over.

KEELFAT, s. [from cælan, to cool, Sax.] a cooler, or vessel, in which wort or other liquor is set to cool.

KEEL-HAULING, s. a punishment for offences at sea, by dragging the criminal under water on one side of the ship under the keel, and up again on the other.

KEEL-SHAPED, a. in Botany, applied to those parts of a flower that are bent like the keel of a ship or boat, as the pointal-shaft of the pea, &c.

KEELSON, s. that piece of timber in a ship which is next to her keel, and lies right over it next above the floor timber.

KEEN, a. [cene, Sax.] sharp, or cutting easily, applied to the edge of an instrument, and opposed to blunt. Severe, piercing, or excessively cold, applied to the winds and weather. Eager, vehement. Of great subtlety, applied to the understanding. Acrimonious, or affecting with uneasiness, applied to wit.

KEENLY, ad. sharply, or cutting easily; vehemently, or eagerly; bitterly or acrimoniously.

KEENNESS, s. the quality of being sharp, or cutting easily; rigour of weather, or piercing cold; acrimony; bitterness of mind; eagerness or vehemence.

To KEEP, v. a. [preter. and part. pass. kept; cepan, Sax. hepan, old Belg.] to retain, preserve; to hold for another; to copy carefully; to observe time punctually; to hold; to remain in a place; not to reveal or betray a secret; to remain unhurt; to adhere strictly; to practise or accustom one's self to. "I keep bad hours." Pope. To celebrate, applied to festivals. To observe without violation, applied to promises, contracts, or laws. To maintain at one's own expence; to have in the house. "Keep lodgers." Shak. Used with back, to restrain from doing an action. "Keep back thy servant—from presumptuous sins." Psa. xix. 13. To reserve. Joined to with, to be often with a person as a lover or suitor. "Keeping company with men." Broome. To keep in, to conceal; to forbear telling, applied to secrets. To defend from. "Keep out the weather." Prior. "Keeps out hunger." Dryd. Used with pace, to walk as fast as another. "Keep pace with him." To keep under, to suppress; to subdue; to tyrannize over, or hold in a state of base subjection. Neuterly, to remain in any state. "To keep his bed." Shak. SYNON. We keep that which is our own; we detain that which is another's. We keep what we intend not to part with; we detain what we purpose to restore.

KEEPER, s. one who has prisoners committed to his custody; one who holds any thing for the use of another; one who has the care of parks, or the superintendence of another. Keeper of the Great Seal, is a lord by his office, and styled Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of Great Britain, and is always one of the privy council. All grants, charters, and commissions of the king under the great seal, pass through the hands of the Lord Keeper; for without that seal many of these grants, &c. would be of no force; the king being, in the interpretation of the law, a corporation, and therefore passes nothing but by the great seal, which is also said to be the public faith of the kingdom, being in the greatest esteem and reputation. Keeper of the Privy Seal, is also a lord by his office, through whose hands all grants, pardons, &c. pass, before they come to the great seal; and even some things pass his hands which do not pass the great seal at all. He is also one of the privy council; his duty is to put the seal to no grant, &c. without a warrant, nor with a warrant where it is against law, or inconvenient, but shall first acquaint the king therewith.

KEEPERSHIP, s. the office of a keeper.

KEEPING, s. in Painting, denotes the representation of objects in the same manner that they appear to the eye at different distances from it; for which the painter should have recourse to the rules of perspective.

KEG, s. [caque, Fr.] a small barrel.

KEHL, a fortress of Suabia, situated at the conflux of the Kinzig into the Rhine, a mile and a half E. of Strasburg. In the wars with Germany, the French have generally endeavoured to make themselves masters of it, for the sake of transporting troops across the Rhine.

KEIGHLEY, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 6 miles S. of Skipton, with a market on Wednesday. Near it is a large cotton manufactory. It stands near the river Aire, and contains 6,864 inhabitants.

KELL, s. See CAUL.

KE'LLINGTON, or Callington, a town in Cornwall, with a woollen manufactory; situated on the river Tamar, 12 miles S. of Launceston, and 217 W. by S. of London. It is not inferior to many of the Cornish boroughs for wealth and buildings, having one broad street, a market-house, and a neat church. Market on Wednesday.

KELP, s. a salt produced from calcined sea-weed.

KELPY, s. a supposed spirit of the waters in Scotland.

KE'LSO, a handsome and populous town of Roxburghshire, containing a large market-place, its principal, with two small streets, about 376 houses, and 4000 inhabitants. It has some manufactures of flannels, linen, stockings, and shoes. It is governed by a baron bailey, and 15 stent masters, who have authority to levy a stent, or rate, on the inhabitants, for the supply of water, repairing the streets, &c. the former of whom, and 7 of the latter, are appointed by the duke of Roxburgh, who is lord of the manor. The celebrated and magnificent abbey, the ruins of which still remain, was founded by David I. in 1128. The environs of it are very agreeable. From the Chalkheugh is a beautiful view of the forks of the rivers, Roxburgh hill, Springwood Park, and the Fleurs. From Pinnacle Hill is seen a vast extent of country, highly cultivated, watered by long reaches of the Tweed, and well wooded on each margin. Much wheat is raised in this neighbourhood, and the fleeces of the sheep are remarkably fine. Kelso has a good market for corn, and is situated on the river Tweed, over which it has a handsome bridge of six arches, at its conflux with the Tiviot, 20 miles S. W. of Berwick, and 42 S. S. E. of Edinburgh.

KELPWORT, s. a genus of plants, distinguished from others in the same class and order by its seed resembling a snail-shell; there are two species found in England, viz. the prickly glasswort, and the stonecrop.

KELSON, s. See KEELSON.

KE'LVEDON, a town of Essex, 41 miles from London.

To KEMB, v. a. [cæmban, Sax.] to comb or disentangle the hair; also to dress flax, hemp, &c.

To KEN, v. a. [cennan, Sax. kennan, Belg.] to descry or see at a distance; to know.

KEN, s. view; or the distance within which a person can see an object.

KE'NDAL, also called Kirby Candale, (that is, a Church in a Valley) a handsome town of Westmoreland, and the largest in the country. It has been long noted for its woollen manufactures; particularly knit stockings, a thick stuff, called cottons, for the clothing of the people in the West Indies, and for sailors' jackets, and linsey-woolsey. There is likewise a considerable tannery; and fish-hooks, waste silk, and wool cards, are manufactured here. The mills for scouring, fulling, and friezing cloth, and for cutting and rasping dying wood, &c. are well worth seeing. So early as the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV. Kendal was noted for its manufactures, special laws having been enacted in those reigns, for the better regulation of the Kendal cloths; and such has been the spirit and industry of the inhabitants, that they have continued to flourish ever since, notwithstanding the disadvantage of possessing no water carriage. Kendal is pleasantly situated in a valley, among hills, upon the river Kent, or Kant, over which it has two stone bridges, and one of wood, with a harbour for boats, and communicating by a canal with all the late inland navigations: 46 miles S. of Carlisle, and 262 N. N. W. of London. Market on Saturday. Inhabitants, in 1821, 10,366.

KE'NNEL, s. [chenil, Fr.] a cot or place where dogs are kept; a pack of hounds; the hole of a fox or other beast. The small cavity or hollow in which runs through a street, from kennel, Belg.

To KE'NNEL, v. n. to live or lie, applied properly to dogs or foxes, and contemptuously used of men.

KE'NSINGTON, a village and royal palace in the county of Middlesex, with handsome gardens; two miles W. of London. The extensive gardens have become a very fashionable walk, particularly on Sundays.

KENT, a county of England, bounded on the W. and S. W. by Surry and Sussex; on the N. by the Thames; on the E. and S. E. by the German Ocean and the Straits of Dover; and on the S. by Sussex and the English Channel. From E. to W. it is about 58 miles, and from N. to S. from 30 to 36. It is divided into five lathes, under each of which are several hundreds, which contain 2 cities, 39 market towns, 408 parish churches, and 1180 villages. The inhabitants in 1811, were 181,925 males, and 188,960 females. In the soil and face of the country there is great diversity. The banks of the Thames are low and marshy, but backed by a range of chalky eminences, sometimes rising to a moderate height. This kind of hard chalky soil, inclining to barrenness, extends to the N. E. extremity of the county, and thence round to Dover, exhibiting its nature in the lofty white cliffs, which here bound the island, and produce that striking appearance at sea which probably gave it the name of Albion. The S. part of Kent, called the Weald, is a flat, woody tract, of a clayey soil; fertile, but unwholesome on account of its moisture. It terminates in the great marsh of Romney. The midland and western districts are a happy mixture of hill and vale, arable and pasture, equal in pleasantness, and variety of products, to any part of England. This county produces, besides the usual objects of agriculture, large quantities of hops; fruit of various kinds, especially cherries and apples, of which there are large orchards for the London markets; madder for dying; timber in the woody parts; and birch twigs for brooms, which form no inconsiderable article of commerce for the metropolis. The country inland from Dover, consisting chiefly of open downs, is excellent for feeding of sheep; and many bullocks are fattened to an extraordinary size in Romney March. Its manufactures are but trifling. The principal rivers, besides the Thames, are the Medway, Darent, Stour, Cray, and Rother. Maidstone is the county town.

KENTUCKY, a country of N. America, situated in its central parts, near the lat. of 38 deg. N. and 85 W. long. It is bounded on the N. and N. W. by the Ohio; on the E. by Virginia; on the S. by the Tennessee States, including the country of the Upper Cherokees; and on the W. and S. W. by the Mississippi and the Cherokee River. It is about 390 miles in length from E. to W. and from 20 to 150 in breadth from N. to S. and is at present divided into 9 counties, 7 of which are Lincoln, Fayette, Bourbon, Mercer, Jefferson, Nelson, and Madison. The principal rivers are the Ohio, the Kentucky, the Licking River, the Red River, the Elkhorn, Dick's River, Green River, Salt River, Cumberland, and the Great Kenhaway, or New River. These are all navigable for boats almost to their sources, for the greatest part of the year. The soil is amazingly fertile; the inhabitants distinguish its quality by first, second, and third rate lands; and scarcely any such thing as a marsh or swamp is to be found. This country has a more temperate and healthy climate than the other settled parts of America. Kentucky was purchased, by the state of Virginia, of the Indians, in 1775, and formed into an independent state in 1792. In 1790, the number of inhabitants was 73,677, and, in 1810, they had increased to 406,511. There are many considerable towns, the principal of which are, Frankfort the capital, Lexington, and Washington.

KEPT, preter and part. pass. of KEEP.

KERCHEIF, or KERCHIEF, s. a head-dress.

KERF, s. [ceorfan, Sax.] the slit sawn away between two pieces of stuff.

KERMES, s. a roundish body, of the bigness of a pea, and of a brownish red colour, covered, when most perfect, with a purplish gray dust. It contains a multitude of little distinct granules, soft, and when crushed yields a scarlet juice. It is found adhering to a kind of holme-oak. In Spain it is used as a cordial for lying-in women, and prevents abortion; it is also of great use in dying. Before the last century it was understood to be a vegetable excrescence, but we know it to be the extended body of an animal parent, filled with a numerous offspring, which are the little red granules.

KERN, s. an Irish foot soldier; also, a hand-mill consisting of two pieces of stone, by which corn is ground.

To KERNE, v. a. to harden as ripened corn; to granulate.

KERNEL, s. [cyrnel, a gland, Sax.] that part of a nut which is contained in the shell; any thing included in a husk or skin. The seed in pulpy fruit; the central part of any thing which is covered with a crust, hard substance, or with a concretion. Hard knobs formed in the flesh; the glands of the throat.

To KERNEL, v. n. to ripen or grow to kernels.

KERNELLY, a. full of kernels; resembling kernels.

KERNELWORT, s. a species of fig-wort.

KERRY, a county of Ireland in the province of Munster, bounded on the W. by the Atlantic Ocean; on the N. by the river Shannon; on the E. by the counties of Lime-rick and Cork; and on the S. by a part of Cork and the ocean. It is about 54 miles long, and from 18 to 40 broad. It possesses many fine harbours, and the southern district is plain and fertile; but a large part is full of mountains, almost inaccessible, so that little corn is produced, and grazing is more attended to. Considerable quantities of beef, butter, hides, and tallow, are exported. It contains 84 parishes, about 19,400 houses, and 107,000 inhabitants.

Iron ore is to be had in most of the southern baronies, and here are several spas, or medicinal springs. The principal rivers are the Blackwater, Feal, Gale and Brick, Cash in Mang, Lea, Flesk, Laune, Carrin, Farthin, Finny, and Roughty. The county town is Tralee.

KERSEY, s. [karsaye, Belg, carisée, Fr.] a coarse woollen manufacture between a stuff and a cloth.

KESTEVEN, one of the three divisions of Lincolnshire, containing the western part of the county, from the middle to the southern extremity. It possesses variety of soil; but, on the whole, though intermixed with large heaths, is a fertile country. Part of the fens in Lincolnshire are in this district; the air of which, however, is more salubrious than that of the district of Holland; and the soil, moreover, is more fruitful.

KESTREL, s. [quercelle, Fr.] a little kind of bastard hawk.

KESWICK, a small, but neat, and well-built town of Cumberland, consisting of one long street. It has considerable manufactures of woollen stuffs, flannels, duffels, &c. and is pleasantly seated in a beautiful and extensive vale, surrounded by hills, through which flows the Derwent, 25 miles N. W. by N. of Kendal, and 291 N. N. W. of London. Market on Saturday.

KESWICK, Vale of, a romantic spot, in the southern part of Cumberland, lately much visited by the admirers of beautiful scenes in nature. Here is the lake of Keswick, or more properly, the lake of Derwent-Water. To the N. of this romantic piece of water soars the lofty mountain Skiddaw, near the foot of which is Basingthwaite-Water. To the S. are the craggy hills of Borrowdale, where the eagles build their nests, and whence the Derwent derives its supplies of water.

KETCH, s. [caicchio, a barrel, Ital.] a small vessel used to bring fish to market, or as a tender to large ships. It has two masts, its main-sail and top-sail standing square as ships do, and its fore-sail and jib like those of hoys.

KETTERING, a handsome, populous, trading town, in Northamptonshire, with manufactures of lace, shalloons, serges, tammies, &c. in which near 2000 hands are said to be employed. It has a sessions-house for the county, and is seated on a river that runs into the Nen, 12 miles N. E. of Northampton, and 75 N. W. of London. Market on Friday.

KETTLE, s. [cetl, Belg.] a vessel in which liquor and meat is boiled. The name of pot is given to the boiler that bellies out in the middle, and grows narrower towards the top; but that of kettle, to the vessel whose sides are straight from the bottom, or grow wider towards the top: authors, however, use these words promiscuously.

KETTLEDUM, s. a drum whose body is brass, and resembles the shape of a kettle.

KEW, a village of Surry, on the banks of the Thames, opposite to Old Brentford, and about 7 miles W. by S. of London. On its green is Kew-house, a royal palace, celebrated for its fine gardens, and the king's exotic garden. The last has been brought to great perfection by the introduction of many new plants from Africa, and New South Wales, and is known throughout all Europe by the late Mr. Aiton's Hortus Kewensis. The palace was formerly the seat of Mr. Mollineux, secretary to king George II. when prince of Wales. A stone bridge has been built over the Thames to Brentford.

KEX, s. a provincial term for hemlock.

KEY, s. [coeg, Sax.] a little iron instrument, formed with holes answering to the wards of a lock, by which the bolt is pushed forward or backward; an instrument by which any thing is screwed, turned, shut, or opened. Figuratively, at explanation of any thing obscure, mysterious, or difficult. The parts of a musical instrument, particularly of a spinnet, which are struck by the fingers. In Music, a certain fundamental note or tone, to which the whole piece is accommodated, with which it usually begins, and must always end. In Architecture, the last stone placed at the top of an arch. In Commerce, a bank raised perpendicular from the water, or a wharf made use of for shipping or unloading goods. See QUAY.

KEYAGE, s. money paid for laying, or loading and unloading, goods at a key.

KEYHOLE, s. the aperture in a door or lock, through which the key is put.

KEYNSHAM, a town in Somersetshire, with a market on Thursday. It is commonly called Smoky Keynsham, and is seated on the river Avon, over which there is a bridge, and it has been of note for maltsters. It is 115 miles distant from London.

KEYSTONE, s. the middle or upper stone of an arch.

KIANG-NAN, a province of China, bounded on the N. by Changtong; on the E. by the Gulf of Nanquin; on the S. by Tchekiang and Kiang-Si; and on the W. by Houan and Hou-Quang. It contains 14 cities of the first rank, and 93 of the second and third, which are very populous, and of the greatest note for trade in the empire. It is the rendezvous of all the great barks, being full of lakes, rivers, and canals; and their silks, japanned goods, ink, and paper, are in high esteem. In the city of Changhi, only, there are 200,000 weavers of plain cottons and muslins. Nanking is the capital.

KIBE, s. [kibwe, Brit.] a chilblain, or chap in the heels caused by cold.

KIBED, a. troubled with kibes or chilblains.

To KICK, v. a. [kauchen, Teut.] to strike with the foot.

KICK, s. a blow given with the foot.

KICKER, s. one who strikes with his foot.

KICKSHAW, s. [supposed to be corrupted from quelque chose, Fr.] something contemptuous, fantastical, or ridiculous; a dish so changed by cookery that it can scarcely be known. The last sense is that which is now in use.

KICKSEY-WICKSEY, s. a cant word, applied in ridicule and contempt to a wife.

KID, s. [kid, Dan.] the young of a goat. Figuratively, applied to a young child.

To KID, v. a. to bring forth kids, applied to a she-goat.

KIDDER, s. an engrosser of corn, to enhance its price.

KIDDERMINSTER, a town of Worcestershire, the principal manufacturing place in the county, and long celebrated for its manufactures of woollens, carpets, poplins, crapes, bombazeens, &c. The inhabitants are about 6000. Its former trade of stuffs, however, is much declined, on account of the general use of cotton goods; but its carpet manufactory has greatly increased; and it is still the first market in England for pile or plush carpets, which, for beauty of colour and patterns, exceed any other. These are frequently called Wilton, from having been first made at that town; but, at present, by much the greater part are made at Kidderminster. The silk and worsted trades have also been introduced here, and employ about 2000 hands. The goods go chiefly to Portugal, and their carriage has been much facilitated by the late canal communications. It is seated under a hill, on the river Stour, 14 miles S. E. of Bridgenorth, and 125 N. W. of London. Market on Thursday.

KIDDLE, or KIDEL, s. a dam or wear in a river, with a narrow cut in it, for the laying of pots or other engines to catch fish. They are corruptly called kettles, and are much used in Wales and Kent.

To KIDNAP, v. a. [from kind, Belg. a child] to steal children, or human beings.

KIDNAPPER, s. one who steals human beings.

KIDNEY, s. [the etymology unknown] in Anatomy, are two in number, one on each side; they have the same figure as kidney-beans; their length is four or five fingers, their breadth three and their thickness two; the right is under the liver, and the left under the spleen. The use of the kidneys is to separate the urine from the blood, which, by the motion of the heart and arteries, is thrust into the emulgent branches, which carry it to the little glands, by which the serosity being separated, is received by the orifice of the little tubes, which go from the glands to the pelvis, and from thence it runs by the ureters into the bladder. Figuratively, race or kind, in ludicrous language.

KIDNEYBEAN, s. a plant so named from its resembling a kidney.

KIDNEY-VETCH, s. a plant the same with the ladies-finger, found on dry and chalky pastures.

KIDNEYWORT, s. an herb called also navelwort, and wall pennywort. It has alternate leaves, with central leaf-stocks; a branched stem, and yellowish, or greenish white, spikes of flowers. It grows on old walls and stony places, and flowers from May to July.

KIDWELLY, a town of Carmarthenshire in S. Wales, with a market on Tuesday. It is seated on the Towy, and was formerly of note for clothing. It is 230 miles W. by N. of London.

KILDA'RE, a county in the province of Leinster, 33 miles in length, and from 12 to 21 in breadth. It is bounded on the W. by King and Queen's County; on the N. by Meath; on the E. by Dublin and Wicklow; and on the S. by Carlow. It contains 11,200 houses, and about 56,000 inhabitants, and is a fine, arable, fertile country, well watered by the Barrow, Liffy, Boyne, and other rivers.

KILDA'RE, a town of Leinster, capital of a county of the same name. It is chiefly supported by frequent horse-races on what is called the Curragh, (a fine plain, containing upwards of 3000 acres) and is 27 miles S. W. of Dublin.

KILDERKIN, s. [kindekin, a baby, Belg.] a small barrel; a liquid measure, containing two firkins, or eighteen gallons, beer measure; and sixteen, ale measure. Two kilderkins make a barrel, and four an hogshead.

KILGARRON, a town in S. Wales, in Pembrokeshire, with a market on Wednesday. It is 227 miles W. N. W. o. London.

KILHAM, a town in the East Riding of Yorkshire, with a market on Saturday. It is 200 miles N. of London.

KILKENNY, a county of Leinster, 35 miles in length and 18 in breadth, and bounded on the W. by Tipperary, and on the N. by Queen's County, on the E. by Carlow and Wexford, and on the S. by Waterford. It contains 127 parishes, about 17,750 houses, and 100,000 inhabitants. The surface is generally level, and the soil fertile, and being proper for tillage, produces corn, wool, marble, and a species of coal, which, like charcoal, burns without smoke, is very durable in burning, and without any blaze, produces an uncommon heat. The country abounds with fine plantations, and is, from the purity of the air, esteemed extremely healthful. The principal rivers are, the Barrow, which bounds it on the E.; the Suir, which forms its southern boundary; and the Nore, which crosses it from N. to S. Its capital (o. the same name) is an ancient, populous city, and has a tolerable trade.

To KILL, v. a. [formerly written quell, from cwellan, Sax.] to murder or deprive of life. Figuratively, to deprive of the power of growing.

KILLER, s. one who deprives of life, or puts to death.

KILLICRA'NKIE, a noted pass of Perthshire, near the junction of the Tummel with the Garry. It is the grand entrance into the Highlands in those parts, and is formed by lofty mountains impending over the Garry, which rushes through in a deep, darksome, and rocky channel, overhung with trees, forming a scene of horrible grandeur. Formerly this was a pass of much difficulty and danger; a path hanging over a tremendous precipice, threatened destruction to the least false step of the traveller. At present, a fine road, formed by the soldiery lent by government, gives an easy access to the remote Highlands; and the two sides are joined by a fine arch.

KILLOW, or CA'LOW, s. an English name for a black earth, of a mixture between the marbles, ochres, and clay, common in many parts of England, Wales, and Ireland.

KILMARNOCK, a town of Scotland, the largest in Ayrshire. It has a manufacture of carpets, serges, and other woollen goods, and a trade in saddlery, leather, &c. In 1811, the number of inhabitants was 10,148. It is seated near the Irvine, 11 miles N. N. E. of Ayr, and 20 S. S. E. of Glasgow.

KILN, s. [cyln, Sax.] a stove or furnace, contrived for admitting heat, and drying or burning such things as are contained in it.

To KILNDRY, v. a. to dry in a kiln.

KIMBO, a. [a schembo, Ital.] crooked; bent; with the arms bent, and sticking out from the sides.

KIMBOLTON, a town in Huntingdonshire; with an elegant castle. It is 8 miles W. S. W. of Huntingdon, and 63 N. of London. Market on Friday.

KIN, s. [cynne, Sax.] of the same family; a relation; of the same race. Used as a termination to express something diminutive; thus mannikin, a little man; minnikin, a very small pin.

KINCA'RDINESHIRE, or Mearns, a county of Scotland, bounded on the N. W. and N. by Aberdeenshire, E. by the German Ocean, and S. and S. W. by Angus-shire. Its length along the coast is 30 miles, and its greatest breadth 20. It contains 12,580 male, and 14,815 female inhabitants. The N. W. part is mountainous, and chiefly adapted for pasture, but to the south of the Grampians the surface is in general fertile. Stonehaven is the county town.

KIND, a. [from cynne, Sax.] behaving with civility to others; benevolent, or filled with general good will.

KIND, s. [cynne, Sax.] race; or class containing several species. Kind, in Teutonic English, answers to genus, and sort to species; a distinction not always observed. The particular nature of a thing; the natural state of a thing. "Levied in kind upon corn." Arbuth. Nature, or particular manner. Sort, used with in, implying by way of. "In a kind of scorn." Bacon. Manner; way.

To KINDLE, v. a. [cyndelan, Sax.] to set on fire; to light, or make to burn. Figuratively, to excite, to inflame, or exasperate; to catch fire. To bring forth, applied to rabbits, &c. from cennan, Sax.

KINDLER, s. one that lights or sets fire to. Figuratively, one that inflames, or excites disturbances.

KINDLY, ad. in a civil, good-natured manner.

KINDLY, a. [from the substantive] of the same nature; homogenial; suiting or agreeing with. Insinuating; mild.

KINDNESS, s. civil behaviour; favourable treatment; or a constant and habitual practice of friendly offices, and benevolent actions.

KINDRED, s. [cynrene, Sax.] relation by birth or marriage.

KINDRED, a. native; congenial; agreeing to the nature of a person or thing.

KINE, s. the old plural of Cow.

KINETON, a town in Warwickshire, held, as its name imports, by the kings of England, if not before, yet certainly by Edward the Confessor, and William the Conqueror. It is 9 miles E. of Stratford, and 81 W. N. W. of London. Market on Tuesday, chiefly for black cattle.

KING, s. [cyng, Sax.] a person who rules singly over a people. In England, the king has power of making peace and war, and calling, continuing, proroguing, and dissolving of parliaments; of enforcing old laws, determining rewards and punishments, pardoning offenders, laying embargoes on shipping, and of opening and shutting sea-ports. He is the fountain of honour, and has the sole power of conferring dignities and titles of honour; as creating dukes, earls, barons, &c. In Gaming, a card with the picture of a king, in whist, next to an ace. The four kings are, David, Alexander, Cesar, and Charles, whose names are still printed on the French cards, and are supposed to represent the four monarchies of the Jews, Greeks, Romans, and that of the Franks under Charlemagne. King at Arms, is a principal officer at arms, that has pre-eminence of the society of heralds; of these there are three, named Garter, Norroy, and Clarencieux.

KINGS, Book of, two canonical books of the Old Testament, so called, because they contain the history of the kings of Israel and Judah; from the beginning of the reign of Solomon, down to the death of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, who was carried captive into Babylon, comprising the space of about 550 years.

To KING, v. a. to rule as a king; to raise to the dignity of a king.

KINGCRAFT, s. the art of governing.

KINGCUP, s. in Botany, a kind of crowfoot.

KINGDOM, s. [cyndedom, Sax.] the dominion or territories subject to a king. Among Naturalists, a class or order of things or beings. Figuratively, a tract or region. SYNON. Empire conveys an idea of a vast territory, composed of various people; whereas kingdom implies one more bounded, and intimates the unity of that nation of which it is formed.

KINGFISHER, s. a sort of bird.

KING GEORGE'S SOUND, the name given by Captain Cook, in 1778, to the harbour which he discovered on the W. coast of N. America, at the mouth of a great river, in lon. 126. 48. W. and lat. 49. 33. N. But the natives called it Nootka, the name now generally adopted by the English. Upon the sea-coast the land is tolerably high and level; but within the Sound, it rises into steep hills, which have an uniform appearance. The trees of which the woods are composed, are the Canadian pine, white cypress, and two or three other sorts of pine. About the rocks and borders of the woods were seen some strawberry plants, and raspberry, currant, and gooseberry bushes, all in a flourishing state. The principal animals seen here were racoons, martens, and squirrels. Birds are far from being numerous, and those that are to be seen are remarkably shy, owing, perhaps, to their being continually harassed by the natives, who take them for food, and use their feathers as ornaments. The variety of fish is not very great here, the principal sorts are the common herring, a silver-coloured bream, and another of a brown colour. The stature of the natives is, in general, below the common standard; their persons being pretty plump, though not muscular. The women are, in general, of the same size and proportion as the men. Their bodies are always covered with red paint, but their faces are ornamented with a variety of colours, a black, a bright red, or a white colour; the last of which gives them a ghastly and horrible appearance. They appear to be docile, courteous, and good-natured; but they are quick in resenting injuries, and as quickly forget them. A rattle and a small whistle are the only instruments of music that were seen among them. Their houses consist of very long, broad planks, resting upon the edges of each other, tied in different parts with withes of pine-bark. Their furniture consists principally of chests and boxes of various sizes, piled upon each other, at the sides or ends of their houses, in which are deposited their garments, and whatever they deem valuable. They have also square and oblong pails, and bowls to eat their food out of, &c. From their curing their fish in their houses, and leaving their bones and fragments in heaps of filth before the doors, and from their houses being without chimneys, their habitations have a strong disagreeable smell of train oil, fish, and smoke.

KINGLIKE, or KINGLY, a. royal; belonging or suitable to a king.

KINGLY, ad. with an air of majesty; with superior dignity.

KING'S BENCH, s. is a court in which the king was formerly accustomed to sit in person, and on that account was moved with the king's household. This was originally the only court in Westminster-hall, and from this it is thought that the courts of Common Pleas and the Exchequer were derived. As the king in person is still presumed in Law to sit in this court, though only represented by his judges, it is said to have supreme authority, and the proceedings in it are supposed to be coram nobis, that is, before the king. This court consists of the lord chief justice, and the other justices or judges, who are invested with a sovereign jurisdiction over all matters, whether of a criminal or public nature. It frequently proceeds on indictments found before other courts, and removed by certiorari into this. Persons illegally committed to prison, though by the king and council, or either of the houses of parliament, may be bailed in it; and in some cases even upon legal commitments. Writs of mandamus are issued by this court, for the restoring of officers in corporations, &c. unjustly turned out, and freemen-wrongfully disfranchised. This court is now divided into a crown side, and plea side; the one determining criminal, and the other civil causes. The officers of this court, on the crown side, are the clerk and secretary of the crown; and on the side of the pleas there are two chief clerks or prothonotaries, and their secretary and deputy, the custos brevium, two clerks of the papers, the clerk of the declarations, the signet and sealer of the bills, the clerk of the rules, clerk of the errors, and the clerk of the bails; to which may be added the filazers, the marshal of the court, and the cryer.

KINGSBRIDGE, a town of Devonshire, with a market on Saturday. It is but a mean place; is governed by a portreve; and consists of about 150 houses, chiefly in one street. It is 201 miles W. by S. of London.

KINGSCLEAR, a town in Hants, pleasantly situated on the edge of the Downs, near Berks, 9 miles N. by W. of Basingstoke, and 57 S. S. W. of London. It was once the seat of the West Saxon kings. Market on Tuesday.

KING'S COUNTY, a county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, 34 miles in length, and from 13 to 17 in breadth. It is bounded on the N. by West-Meath; on the E. by Kildare and Queen's County; on the S. by Queen's County and Tipperary; and on the W. by the river Shannon and a part of Tipperary. The soil is various; in some parts it is very fertile, in others not so rich nor so well inhabited as some other counties. It contains 52 parishes, about 13,536 houses, and 74,500 inhabitants: the capital is Philipstown.

KING'S EVIL, s. a scrofulous distemper, in which the glands are ulcerated; it derives its name from a vulgar opinion that it may be cured by the touch of a king or crowned head.

KINGSHIP, s. royalty, or the state, office, and dignity of a king.

KINGSPEAR, s. in Botany, the asphodelus.

KING'S SWINFORD, a considerable village of Staffordshire, a little to the N. of Stourbridge, containing 8267 inhabitants.

KINGSTON-UPON-THAMES, a well-built town of Surry, with 4144 inhabitants, so called from its having been the residence of several of our Saxon kings, some of whom were crowned here. The Lent assizes for the county are held here. It is seated on the Thames, over which it has a wooden bridge of 22 piers and 20 arches, 11 miles S. W. of London. Market on Saturday.

K'INGSTON, or Kynetton, a pretty large and well-built town of Herefordshire, with a good trade in narrow cloth. It is seated on the river Arrow, 15 miles N. W. of Hereford, and 155 W. N. W. of London. Market on Wednesday. The markets on Wednesday before Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmas, are so considerable for corn, cattle, leather, home-made linen, woollen cloth, and provisions, that they more resemble fairs.

K'INGSTON RUSSEL, a town near Dorchester. Its manor is held by serjeantry, viz. to be cup-bearer to the king at the four principal feasts in the year. Market on Thursday.

K'INGSTON, a sea-port town of Jamaica, in the West Indies, containing about 1665 houses, besides negro-huts and warehouses. In 1788, the number of white inhabitants was 6539, of free people of colour 3280, of slaves 16,659. It is seated on the N. side of the Bay of Port Royal, on the S. coast of the island. It is a large town, about a mile in length, and half a mile in breadth. It is laid out into little squares and cross streets, and is a place of considerable trade and opulence. Many of the houses, in the upper part of the town, are very magnificent; and the markets for flesh, turtles, fish, poultry, fruits, and vegetables, are inferior to none. Lat. 17. 50. N. lon. 76. 52. W.

KINGSTONE, s. a kind of fish.

KINROSS, a town of Scotland, in the shire of Kinross, seated on the river Leven, not far W. of Loch Leven, and 20 miles N. of Edinburgh. The manufactures of this town are linen and cutlery ware.

KINROSS, a shire or county of Scotland, surrounded by the shires of Perth and Fife. It is about 30 miles in circuit, its length and breadth being nearly equal. The number of male inhabitants is 3466, females 3779.

KISS, s. a salute given by joining the lips.

KISSER, s. one that kisses.

KISSINGCRUST, s. the thin tender crust of bread, formed where one loaf touches another in the oven.

KISTI, one of the seven Caucasian nations, that inhabit the countries between the Black Sea and the Caspian. They consist of 16 different districts or tribes, which are often at variance with each other, and with their neighbours. Their dialects appear to have no analogy with any known language, and their history and origin are utterly unknown. Those belonging to the districts of Wapi, Angusht, and Shalkah, submitted to Russia in 1770. The Thetshan tribe is so numerous and warlike, and has given the Russians so much trouble, that its name is usually given by them to the whole Kisti nation. The Ingushi live in villages near each other, containing about 20 or 30 houses; they are diligent husbandmen, and rich in cattle. Many of their villages have a stone tower, which serves in time of war as a retreat to their women and children, and a magazine for their effects. These people are all armed, and have the custom of wearing shields. Their religion is very simple, but has some traces of Christianity. They believe in one God, whom they call Dailé, and, on the first day of the week, rest from labour. They eat pork, and have a fast in spring, and another in summer. They observe no ceremonies either at births or deaths; but allow of polygamy, and, at certain times, a sheep is sacrificed by a person who seems to be considered as a kind of priest, as he is obliged to live in a state of celibacy. A singular sort of hospitality is attributed to these people by Major Rennel. When a guest, or stranger, comes to lodge with them, one of the host's daughters is obliged to receive him, to unsaddle and feed his horse, take care of his baggage, prepare his dinner, pass the night with him, and continue at his disposal during his stay.

KNEW, the preterit of KNOW.

KNIFE, s. [plural knives, it being a general rule, that nouns ending in f or fe in the singular, make the plural by changing f and fe into ves; cnif, Sax.] an instrument consisting of a steel blade with an edge on one side, and sometimes with a sharp point, used particularly in cutting meat and killing animals.

KNIGHT, (the gh in this word and its compounds and derivatives is mute, and pronounced as if spelt nite) s. [cnicht, Sax.] among the Romans, was a person of the second degree of nobility, following immediately that of the senators. At the ceremony of conferring this honour, he had a horse given him, which was kept at the public charge, with which he was to serve in the wars. Knight, in a modern sense, properly signifies a person, who, for his virtue and prowess, is by the king raised above the rank of gentleman, into a higher class of dignity and honour. Knighthood was formerly the first degree of honour in the army, and conferred with much ceremony on those who had distinguished themselves by some notable exploit in arms. The ceremonies at their creation have been various; the principal was a box on the ear, and a stroke with a sword on the shoulder; they put on him a shoulder-belt, a gilt sword, spurs, and other military accoutrements: being thus armed as a knight, he was led to the church. Camden describes the manner of making a knight bachelor among us, which is the lowest and most ancient order of knighthood, to be thus: the person kneeling was gently struck on the shoulder by the prince, and accosted in these words: "Rise, and be a knight, in the name of God." Knight is also understood of a person admitted into any order, either purely military, or military and religious; as, Knight of the Garter, of Malta, of the Holy Ghost, &c.

KNIGHT-ERRANTRY, s. the practice of wandering about in quest of needless encounters.

KNIGHT OF THE POST, s. an hireling evidence, or one that will swear any thing if paid for it.

KOLA, a town of the Russian government of Archangel, and the capital of Russian Lapland. It has a good harbour of the river Kola, near the bay of the same name in the Frozen Ocean, where is a considerable fishery for whales, sea dogs, and other fish, which the inhabitants cure for sale. Lat. 68. 52. N. lon. 33. 1. E.

KONINGSBERG, the capital of the kingdom of Prussia, with an university and a magnificent palace, in which is a hall 274 feet long, and 59 broad, without pillars to support it, and a handsome library. The town-house, the exchange, and the cathedral, are fine structures. The tower of the castle is very high, and has 284 steps to the top, whence there is an extensive prospect. There are 18 churches in all, of which 14 are Lutherans, 3 Calvinists, and 1 is Romish. The number of houses is about 3800. The town is about 7 English miles in circumference, and, including the garrison of 7000 men, contains 60,000 inhabitants. It stands on the Pregel, a navigable river which here falls into the eastern extremity of the Frische Haf, an inlet of the Baltic. No ships drawing more than 7 feet water, can pass the bar, and come up to the town; so that the large vessels anchor at Pillau, a small town on the Baltic, which is the port of Koningsberg; and the merchandise is sent up in smaller vessels. On June 16th, 1807, this place fell into the hands of the French, together with vast quantities of military stores (chiefly provided by England) which the allied armies of Prussia and Russia were obliged to abandon, in consequence of the defeat they had sustained on the 14th in the battle of Friedland. It was, however, restored to Prussia by the peace of Tilsit, which was signed on the 6th of July following. The trade of Koningsberg is very considerable. It is 170 miles N. of Warsaw. Lat. 54. 42. N. lon. 20. 48. E.

KORIANCS, a nation on the borders of Kamtschatka, tributary to the Russians. There are two sorts of Koriacs: those who are properly called by that name have a fixed residence; the others are wanderers, and are known by the appellation of Rein-deer Koriacs. Their flocks are very numerous, and they maintain them by conducting them to those cantons that abound with moss. When these pastures are exhausted, they seek for others. In this manner they wander about incessantly, encamping under tents of skin, and supporting themselves with the produce of their deer, which are as serviceable for draught to the Koriacs, as the dogs are to the Kamtschadales. Their country is terminated to the S. by the peninsula of Kamtschatka, and the Gulf of Penginsk; to the E. by the Ocean; to the N. by the country of the Tehoukchis; and to the W. by the Tongouses, the Lamouts, and the Yakouts. The regular occupation of the Koriacs, is hunting and fishing; but every season will not permit them to follow it. During these intervals, shut up in their profound habitations, they sleep, smoke, and get drunk. Like the Kamtschadales, they live upon dried fish, and the flesh and fat of the whales and sea-wolf. Rein-deer is their favourite dish. Vegetables also form a part of their food: they gather in autumn various sorts of berries, of a part of which they make themselves a refreshing beverage, and the rest is bruised to powder, and kneaded with the oil of the whale or sea-wolf. Their passion for strong liquors, increased by the dearness of brandy, and the difficulty of procuring it, has led them to invent a drink equally potent, which they extract from a red mushroom, known in Russia as a strong poison, by the name of moukhamorr. The wandering Koriacs have the same characteristic outlines as the Kamtschadales. Among the women, particularly, there are very few who have not sunk eyes, flat noses, and prominent cheeks. The men are almost entirely beardless, and have short hair. The Koriacs acknowledge a Supreme Being, the creator of all things, and imagine that the sun is his throne, or palace. They address no prayer to him; goodness, they say, is his essence; all the good that exists in the world proceeds from him, and it is impossible that he should do any injury. The principle of evil they consider as a malignant spirit, and, to appease his wrath, offer up, as expiatory sacrifices, various animals newly born; as rein-deer, and dogs, also the first-fruits of their hunting and fishing, and whatever they possess that is most valuable.

KUBE'SHA, a large town of Asia, in the country of the Lesguis, one of the seven Caucasian nations, between the Black Sea and the Caspian. Colonel Gaeber, who wrote an account of these countries in 1728, gives the following description of this very curious place: "Kubsha is a large strong town, situated on a hill, between high mountains. Its inhabitants are excellent artists, and make very good fire-arms, sabres, coats of mail, and several articles in gold and silver, for exportation. They have likewise, for their own defence, small copper cannon, of three pounds calibre, cast by themselves. They coin Turkish and Persian silver money, and even rubles, which readily pass current, because they are of the full weight and value. In their valleys they have pasture and arable land, as well as gardens; but they purchase the greater part of their corn, trusting chiefly for their support to the sale of their manufactures, which are much admired in Turkey, Persia, and the Crimea. They are generally in easy circumstances, and are a quiet, inoffensive people, but high-spirited and independent. Their town is considered as a neutral spot, where the neighbouring princes can deposit their treasures with safety. They elect yearly twelve magistrates, to whom they pay the most unlimited obedience; and, as all the inhabitants are on a footing of the most perfect equality, each individual is sure to have, in his turn, a share in the government. In the year 1725, their magistrates, as well as the usniel, or khan, of the Caitaks, acknowledged the sovereignty of Russia, but without paying any tribute.

To KYD, v. n. to know.

L Is a semi-vowel, or liquid consonant, the eleventh letter of the English alphabet. In the Saxon it was aspirated, as in hlaf, Sax. a loaf; as it is at present by the Spaniards, and by the Cambro-Britons, in llan, a temple. The figure of the capital L we borrow from the Saxons, which is the same as that of the Romans, who likewise seem to have taken theirs from the Λ of the Greeks, with one of its sides placed upon the line, thus, $\triangleright$. It is pronounced by putting the tongue to the palate, and breathing from the throat. At the end of a monosyllable it is always doubled, as in fall, kill, &c. but at the end of a word of two or more syllables it is written single, as in doubtful; as it likewise is when it occurs in the middle of compound words; for though we write skill and full, when they are alone, with a ll, yet when they are compounded, we leave out an l in each, as in skillful. When it comes before e, at the end of a word, it is pronounced as if the e came before it, as in bible, feeble, title. As a numeral, it stands for 50, and when a line is drawn over it, thus, $\overline{L}$, for 50,000. L also stands for Libra, a Pound; also for Liber, a Book.

LA, interjec. look! behold! see!

LABDANUM, s. a resin of the softest kind, of a strong and not unpleasant smell, an aromatic, but not agreeable taste. It exudes from a low spreading shrub of the cistus kind in Crete.

LABOURSOME, a. done with great exertion of strength.

LA'BRADOR, an extensive country to the E. of Hudson's Bay, in N. America. The climate even about Hay's River, in only lat. 57. N. is excessively cold during winter. The snows begin to fall in October, and continue falling, by intervals, the whole winter; and, when the frost is most vigorous, in form of the finest sand. The ice on the rivers is then eight feet thick; port wine freezes in a solid mass; brandy coagulates; and the very breath falls on the blankets of a bed in the form of hoar frost. The sun rises in the shortest day at five minutes past nine, and sets five minutes before three; in the longest, it rises at three, and sets about nine. The ice begins to disappear in May, and hot weather commences about the middle of June, which at times is so violent as to scorch the faces of the hunters. The animals in these countries are the moose-deer, stags, rein-deers, bears, tigers, buffaloes, wolves, foxes, beavers, otters, lynxes, martens, squirrels, ermines, wild cats, and hares. The feathered kinds are geese, bustards, ducks, partridges, and all kinds of wild fowl. Their fish are whales, morses, seals, cod-fish, and a white fish preferable to herrings; and in their rivers and fresh waters, pike, perch, carp, and trout. All the quadrupeds in these countries are clothed with a close, soft, warm fur; and even the dogs and cats from Britain, that have been carried into Hudson's Bay, on the approach of winter have changed their appearance, and acquired a much longer, softer, thicker coat of hair than they originally had. In summer there is, as in other places, a variety in the colour of the several animals; when that season is over, which holds only for three months, they all assume the livery of winter, and every sort of beasts, and most of their fowls, are of the colour of the snow; every thing animate and inanimate is white. The climate is remarkably healthy, and few parts of the world produce better furs. There are several Moravian settlements on the E. coast, the principal of which is Nain.

LA'MPRON, s. a kind of sea-fish.

LA'NCASHIRE, a county of England, bounded on the W. by the Irish Sea, on the N. by Cumberland and Westmoreland on the E. by Yorkshire, and on the S. by Cheshire. It is 74 miles from N. to S. (including a detached hundred on the north-west, called Furness, which is separated from the rest by a creek, at the head of Morecambe Bay) and from 15 to 44 in its greatest breadth. It is divided into 6 hundreds, which contain 26 market-towns, 62 parishes, 894 villages, and, according to the census of 1821, 512,150 male, and 540,040 female inhabitants. The air, in general, is very healthful, the inhabitants living to a great age. This county comprises a variety of soil and face of country; but upon the whole, it is one of those which are the least favoured as to natural advantages, a proof of which is the ancient thinness of its population, shewn by the very small number of parishes into which it is divided. The hundred of Furness is a wild rugged region, stored with quantities of iron ore and slate, and covered with a growth of underwood, which is cut in succession, and made into charcoal for the use of iron furnaces. The eastern part of the county between the Ribble and the Mersey, comprising the ancient forests of Wyresdale and Bowland, is mountainous, and generally barren; but the southern part of the tract between these two rivers is flat, quite from the sea to the commencement of the ridge called Blackstone Edge, that separates this county from Yorkshire. Much of this is a fertile country, though occasionally deformed by the black turf-bogs, here called mosses, some of which are of large extent. In the north-east part of this division, are some lofty hills, the most noted of which is Pendle-Hill. The remaining part is varied with hill, dale, and moor. The natural products of this county are of little consequence, except the coal and turf with which its southern parts abound. Of the former is a species called cannel, far exceeding all other, not only in making a clear fire, but for being capable of being manufactured into candlesticks, cups, standishes, snuff-boxes, &c. and of being polished, so as to represent a beautiful black marble. Lancashire is little adapted for a corn country, not only, in many parts, from the nature of its soil, but from the remarkable wetness of its climate: the land, however, is singularly fitted for the growth of the potatoe. All the rivers afford salmon; and the Mersey is visited by annual shoals of smelts, here called sparlings, of remarkable size and flavour. As a commercial and manufacturing county, Lancashire is distinguished beyond most others in the kingdom. Its principal manufactures are linen, silk, and cotton goods; fustians, counterpanes, shallcons, bays, serges, tapes, small wares, hats, sail-cloth, sacking, pins, iron goods, cast plate-glass, &c. Of the commerce of this county, it may suffice to observe, that Liverpool is now the second port in the united kingdom. The principal rivers are the Mersey, Irwell, Ribble, Lune, Leven, Wyre, Hodder, Roche, Duddon, Winster, Ken, and Calder; and it has two considerable lakes, Winandermere, and Coniston Water. Lancaster is the county town.

LANCASTER, the county town of Lancashire, is an ancient, well-built, and improving town, containing, in 1821, 10,144 inhabitants. On the summit of a hill stands the castle, which is not ancient, but large and strong, and now serves both as the shire-house and the county-gaol. On the top of this castle is a square tower, called John of Gaunt's Chair, where there is a fine prospect of the mountains of Cumberland, and of the course of the Lune; the view towards the sea extending to the Isle of Man. The town-hall is a handsome structure. Lancaster carries on some foreign trade, especially to the West Indies, America, and the Baltic. The exports are hardware, woollen goods, candles, and cabinet work, for the making of which last it is noted: and it has also a manufacture of sail-cloth. It is seated on the river Lune, which here forms a port for vessels of moderate size, and over which it has a new stone bridge of five elliptical arches, 66 miles S. of LA'PLAND, a large country in the N. part of Europe, and in Scandinavia, lying between Norway, Sweden, Russia, and the sea. It is divided into Danish, or North Lapland; Swedish, or South Lapland; and Russian, or East Lapland. It is extremely cold, and in some places they never see the sun for three months in the year; and the country is all covered with snow the greatest part of the year. It has, properly speaking, neither spring nor autumn, the seasons change so suddenly. The sky is generally serene, and the air healthy, it being subject almost to continual winds. They sow no corn, but have good pastures, which fatten their cattle speedily. This country is full of rocks and mountains; and the principal animals are foxes, martens, bears, elks, wolves, castors, ermines, and rein-deer. The last is the most useful animal they have; for it serves to draw the sledges over the snow with surprising swiftness; likewise their skin serves them for clothing, and their flesh for food. Their huts are made with poles, about 14 feet high, and they fix one end in the earth in a circle, about 12 feet broad. These poles meet at the top, and form a sort of cone; and the outsides are covered with the skins of rein-deer and rags; they are open at the top to let out the smoke; and here they pass their winter. They are very poorly clad, and often lie upon the snow. When they have a mind to change their habitations, they take away the skins and rags, and leave the poles standing. Their chief merchandises are dried cod, and other fish, and the skins of rein-deer; they have also some furs. They are of a short stature, with a large head, broad forehead, blue eyes, broad flat noses, and short, straight, coarse, black hair. They are a rude, brutal sort of people, though some of them have embraced Christianity, which has not mended their morals. They live a great while without the assistance of physicians, and their hair never turns gray. Instead of bread they make use of dried fish, which they reduce to powder. They are very fond of spirituous liquors, and are never sober when they can purchase them. They seldom stay long in one place, but rove about continually, leaving the poles of their huts standing, as was before observed.
